Again the Theatre Hat

Suggestions for Inoffensive Theatre Hats by the Most Distinguished Artists in Paris—And Photographs of Designs Submitted by Various Well Known Women.

The Distressing Predicament of the Paris Theatre Managers

Paris, June 2.

THE theatre hat problem has reached an acute stage here, and the Paris theatre managers have manoeuvred themselves into a mess of perplexities the outcome of which no one dares predict. Paris millinery creations have always been the bete noir of the Paris theatre audiences. At the opera and at many of the more fashionable playhouses there is less complaint at the night performance, for most of the women go in full evening dress without headgear of any kind. It is at the matinees chiefly that the battle rages.

The managers first tackled the problem with posted notices to the ladies to please remove their hats. Nobody paid any attention, so the ushers were instructed to go about the house whispering the request in the ears of offending visitors. "If you provided us a proper and convenient place to put our hats we might oblige you," the ladies answered. Much relieved to find so simple a solution, the managers cheerfully established charming little retiring rooms in the lobbies—but still the problem remained, for the ladies dropped in to glance approvingly at themselves in the mirrors and then passed on to their seats triumphantly hatted as before.

After long and wearisome consideration the managers arrived at the conclusion that, since the ladies would wear hats, the thing to do was to regulate the size and shape of the hats. And with this brilliant idea the managers set to work to determine upon a standard hat which must be worn. To make sure of the best possi-

HELEN'S BURGLAR

He Was a Real Burglar, but He Told Her the Most Delightful Fairy Tales.

When She Was Falling Asleep He Calmly Proceeded to Loot the House from Top to Bottom.

HELEN MEEHAN is a serious young woman of four years who lives at the foot of a steep hill, in a lonely spot near the ruins of Fort George, that is yet within the boundaries of Greater New York.

Helen is round faced and auburn haired. The hair curls in long ringlets that are somewhat annoying to her, because she prefers hair cut close to the head like her brother's. Her large brown eyes are not so merry as those of the other children that play about the foot of the steep hill, or that climb to its top and roll stones down its sides and shiver delightfully at the sound of their striking the other stones at the bottom. Helen Meehan's eyes are earnest and hold endless questions that flow in a stream from her rose-red lips and nimble tongue.

One of Helen's questions concerned that hill. "Papa," she said, "why are hills hills and not roads like the one where the trolley runs?

Her father began to answer truthfully, "I don't know," when it occurred to him that it somewhat weakens parental authority and filial esteem to make such answer, so he looked wise and said, "It is one of the inscrutable designs of Providence."

"What?" asked Helen.

"I mean God made them and He had a good reason that He hadn't made known to us."

"Oh?" And Helen's papa, who is a lawyer and likes to read the papers on Sunday, turned to the page about the Japanese war. Since the Russians are playing so small a part in it he prefers now to call it simply the Japanese war.

Hills to Hide Behind.

Helen always understands her father, although he is serious like herself and sometimes uses words she never heard before. She nodded gravely and said:

"He wants to hide people behind them. Don't you remember when you read stories of battles to me the army always suddenly comes around the base of a hill? Yes, that is what they are for. Some day some one that has been hiding behind that hill will come around the base to the window and I shall see him."

"Tut! Tut! Child!"

Attorney Thomas Meehan kicked away the heap of papers at his feet and went to a window and tried the lock. It was secure, and with a sigh of satisfaction he went back to his newspapers.

"Papa," said Helen, "wont you please play burglar with me?"

"Yes; you be the burglar. Go ahead!"

"But I'm too little to be a burglar. I'm only going on five. Anyway it isn't nice for a lady to steal. It is men that burgle. Please play burglar, papa. All you have to do is wear something black over your face and carry a little lantern that only lets the light out in slits, and take something that isn't yours. Please, papa."

"Some other time, Helen."

And Helen went to the dining room window and stared out at the steep hill and planned the burglar game that should be played some other time.

She had never heard of "Editha's Burglar" Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's story, yet she was about to duplicate it.

Helen's papa was a very busy man who lived a long way from his office in the Potter building, and it nearly always happened that his breakfast was over and he was on his way downtown in the Subway before Helen was dressed and having her oatmeal and orange at the end of the deserted table. Quite as often he did not return for dinner until after Helen was asleep in the single bed in the little room on the second floor, over the porch, that was her own. At such times he came to her room to kiss her "Good night." Sometimes the kiss wakened her. Sometimes it only disturbed her a little in her dreams about the events of the day, the long walk in the morning sunshine with her mamma or the housemaid, the afternoon on the wide porch, with her dolls or picture books, and occasionally, when he would permit, the romp with her brother. And one day when she was quite alone on the porch, the black doll Topsy already asleep, and Lady Dainty, the new doll that came last Christmas, growing so restless that her mamma had to sing "Bye Low" to her, something curious happened.

A man in ragged clothes, who stooped and looked around often as he walked, stopped at the gate and said in a husky voice:

"Is your pa to home, kid?"

"She gasped with the delight of a long cherished plan. Standing at her bedside was the very figure of her imaginings."

Her Hero Arr'ves.

"My name is not Kid. It's Helen. And my papa hardly ever gets home before I go to bed."

"Um!"

The question in Helen's eyes found its way to her lips.

"What's your name?"

The man did not seem to hear.

"Any other men folks live here?"

"No, only my little brother and my mamma and Mary, that's the maid, and me."

"Goodby, young 'un," said the man, slouching off.

"I told you my name was Helen," she called after him.

Then, remembering the duty of hospitality, "Come back and see me some time."

"Thank ye, I will," the man answered grimly, giving one of his queer backward looks at the house, a glance that Helen noticed included the steep hill at whose very foot was their dining room window. But Helen resumed motherly attentions to Lady Dainty, and so engrossing were they that she quite forgot to tell her mamma about the strange man who stopped at the gate and could not remember that her name was Helen.

It was on that very evening that Helen had her long-looked-for chance to play burglar. She had been asleep, it seemed to her, a long time and had had several delightful dreams about Topsy and Lady Dainty. The most wonderful thing had just happened. Lord Algernon, the "boy doll in the dress uit, who lived on One Hundred and Eighty-eighth street, had come around with his mamma to call on Helen and her family, and the two mammas had given their blessing and Lady Dainty and Lord Algernon were being married, Topsy, in lieu of a minister, performing the ceremoo, on the top step. The thrilling ceremony was never finished, at least not in Hreamland, for there was a heavy step in the room and Helen awoke.

She gasped with the delight of a long-cherished plan suddenly realized. Standing at her bedside was the very figure of her imaginings. Papa wore the same black thing over his face she had insisted upon. And he had been very careful to carry out her wishes, for there in his hand was the little lantern that only "let out the light in slits."

She clapped her hands as she did when she was very hungry and cooed as she had done not so many months before in ishy ecstasy. At times of great surprise we are apt to revert to earlier habits, and Helen cooed as musically as she had done when she was six months old and had no more dignified vehicle of expression.

"Papa," she gurgled joyously.

"What are we going to do now?" she giggled.

HELEN MEEHAN WHO WAS ENTERTAINED BY THE BURGLAR.

Helen's Home.

"Yes, yes, Ki—Helen."

"You look awful funny burgling."

Papa stood very still.

"There isn't anything here to burgle but Topsy and Lady Dainty.' And there's my 'Mother Goose' and 'Alice in Wonderland' on the shelf."

"No, there isn't anything worth taking here." Helen kicked herself free from the sheets and baby blanket and pink silk spread and her little white feet, released from the imprisoning clothes, slid to the floor.

Playing the Game of "Burgle."

"Come on. Let's go and take mamma's diamond pin. Wont she be surprised?"

"Wont she, though?" Papa chuckled strangely and Helen moved close to him and tried to look under his mask.

She slipped her wee hand into his.

"How hard your hand feels, papa. like a real burglar's," she said. "Come back and let's go and burgle from mamma.

"All right, but wait a minute, Helen. Where is the pin? Of course I know, but we're playing that I'm a burglar, you know, and a burglar don't know where things is. He has to look for 'em, more's the pity."

"Oh, yes. How funny your voice sounds."

"Yes, I'm making it like a burglar's voice. You must whisper low like me. Where did you say mamma keeps her diamond pin?"

"It's in the bureau drawer, the little one on the left, closest to the bed. And her pearl pin's there, and"—

"And some money, too, maybe?"

"No, papa carries the money."

"Where?"

"Why, you know, papa? Oh, you are a funny burglar. Why, you know you always carry it in your trousers pocket, hanging in the wardrobe in mamma's room."

Then Helen suddenly felt herself lifted in papa's arms, and he was wrapping the pink silk spread closely around her. Helen gurgled again with the mystery and delight of the game.

Carried Her Down Cellar.

"Hush! You're a burglar now and burglars never make a noise. I'm going to carry you through the hall, and when we pass your mamma's room you wave your hand toward the door and don't say a word. Be as still as a little mouse. It's all in the game."

"Yes," Helen assented delightedly. "It's all in the game," and she pointed with my forefinger at the second door in the passage and laughed under her breath lest mamma should awake and interrupt the game.

"Where are you going now?" she whispered softly, for she knew that she was being carried downstairs.

"You're the fence," said the burglar, walking briskly but very quietly.

"What's that?"

"That means that you're the one that stays downstairs and keeps very quiet and takes the goods when I bring 'em down."

Helen was carried down the staircase, along the hall and then down another flight into the cellar, and again cautioned not to speak above a whisper.

Waited for Him to Come Back.

"Yes, dear. That's because I am playing burglar."

"We never played burglar before, did we? Tell me a burglar story, papa."

"Will you promise to keep very quiet until I come back if I do?"

"Yes."

He whispered, "Good-bye, dear. Lie perfectly still until I come back with the things."

Helen lay on the bench, wrapped in the pink spread, and waited. The mice scampered about in the cellar, but Helen Meehan would have been ashamed to be afraid of mice. Except for an occasional squeak of a mouse it was very quiet. She strained her small pink ear for the sound of papa's returning footsteps, but there was only silence. She giggled softly, thinking that perhaps mamma had caught him purloining her jewels and had called Mary to play policeman and put handcuffs on him and lead him off to jail.

Somehow she was on the top step of the front porch again, and Topsy had resumed the marriage ceremony of Lord Algernon and Lady Dainty. The mammas were discussing the place to spend the honeymoon. Helen favored the Zoo in the Bronx, but Lord Algernon's mother said every bride with a title went to the Waldorf-Astoria.

Papa Ends the Game.

She was very uncomfortable sitting there on the top step discussing the arrangements for the honeymoon. Her limbs were cramped and she was very cold. She was suggesting to Lord Algernon's mamma that they would better take the bridal couple within doors, when some one shook her shoulder gently and she looked up into papa's face. The mask was gone, and he was pale and looked troubled.

"Oh, you've come back," said his caugh ter.

"Why are you down here, Helen?"

"You brought me here."

"I brought you here?"

"Yes, when we were playing burglar. Did you get mamma's pins? And did she catch you burgling? And why were you gone so long?"

Helen was lifted in her father's arms, this time very slowly and gently, and she was carried up to the dining-room, where Mamma and Mary and the nearest neighbors were looking at the dining-room window, which was open, and talking in low, excited tones.

"We have missed a diamond pin, and a pearl pin, and a suit of my husband's with some money in the pockets. They were all taken out of our room while we were asleep," Mrs. Meehan was saying.

"It was papa took them," laughed Helen. "We were playing burglar."

Helen's papa went to the telephone and called up the police station.

"A strange burglary—not of the loss, but the manner of it that was remarkable—carried my little girl downstairs to the cellar—never heard a thing until the child crying out in her sleep in the cellar awoke us," she heard him say.

It required two days to convince Helen Meehan that it was not her papa with whom she played burglar, but after forty-eight hours of listening to explanations, she said, "Anyway, he was a nice, kind burglar."

"Of course I know, but we're playing that I'm a burglar."

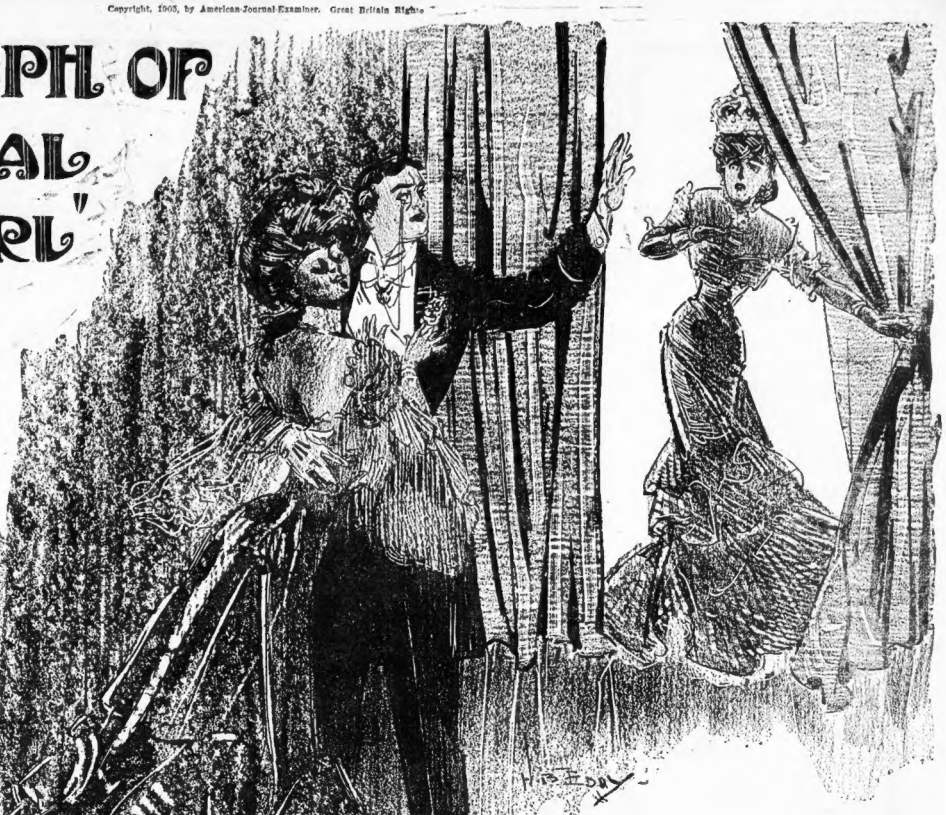
THE TRIUMPH OF AN ORIGINAL "GIBSON GIRL"

HOW Nannie Langhorne Shaw Has Won at Last the Titled Husband for Whom Princess Victoria, the King of England's Eldest Daughter, Has Waited and Waited in Vain.



AT last one of the original Gibson girls is going to marry a lord, a real live English nobleman, a nobleman, moreover, who has the reputation of having had a royal princess in love with him.

It was worth waiting for. But Nannie, the third of the beautiful Langhorne sisters, who is going to cast off the title of plain Mrs. Robert Shaw, of Boston, for the more high-sounding one of Lady Revelstoke, of England, didn't wait.

She put in her time experimenting after the manner of any beauty. She made an experimental plunge into matrimony, at least, so we may consider it, since only a few years later she announced in the divorce courts that the trial was a failure. She gained possession of her child and her liberty, and took them both over to London.

There the story that Lord Revelstoke, head of the Baring family of bankers, had won the love of the eldest daughter of the King of England, has long been matter of gossip. Every American who crosses the water is bound to hear that the Princess Victoria, of Wales, announced at a family meeting attended by the King, the Queen and a number of Princes and Princesses of the blood royal: "I will marry only the man I love, or I will remain single for the rest of my days."

The man she loved was John Baring, the present Lord Revelstoke, a man of about forty, who has been for some eight years head of one of the world's greatest banking firms.

This royal romance has, of course, reached the ears of Mrs. Robbie Shaw, for with her friend, Mrs. John Jacob Astor, she is very much in the king's set.

No doubt she thought it a charming romance, really so wonderfully unusual and democratic. A banker with a comparatively new title to be loved by a king's daughter! Really, now——

The Princess and the Banker.

Then suddenly the banker in question, the hero of the charming romance, crossed her vision. He interested her.

He was not only the hero of a royal romance; he was also the man who, after the failure of his house, a failure that convulsed the whole world of finance, put his shoulder to the wheel and, mindful of the family motto, "Honor in all things," paid off every obligation, every cent of the firm's liabilities.

Lord Revelstoke is a tremendous contrast to Bobbie Shaw, the man who spent his life riding horses, sailing yachts, running auto no secret of it. When she refused self in the Rocky Mountains with gun over complexions figure in London society and soldiers and letting money slip through his to marry him, declaring that she felt tow- his shoulder, looking for another kind of a welcome guest at Marlborough House fingers. He was the contrast that Nannie and him only as a cousin should, he made game to shoot.

Naturally she forgot all about the Princess who admired him, too. And, what is more to the point, he has apparently forgotten all about her, too.

According to common report, and there is much report about Lord Revelstoke always, this is his third tremendous love affair. Of course, that only makes him the more interesting. His first occurred when he was a callow youth. He fell head over ears in love with his own first cousin and made

MRS. NANNIE LANGHORNE SHAW.

PRINCESS VICTORIA OF WALES.

"She to pit herself against a princess of the blood! * * * But a sight of the Princess must have reassured her."

Langhorne Shaw had been unconsciously all sorts of threats, even the time honored looking for ever since her divorce two years ago that he would blow out his brains. In of success, or absence, and a fair compli- of the King.

tween Lord Revelstoke and the Princess Victoria was universally remarked. In fact, by right of being a Princess, Victoria announced quite publicly that she was pleased to look with favor upon the banker. The announcement, of course, aroused a terrible hullabalioo. The whole royal family set all their royal feet down upon it.

At first they said it was too ridiculous to be considered seriously. Then when they found that Victoria was serious, they became even more so. They declared she was threatening the solidity of a kingdom. She was lectured about her duty as a Princess and as a woman.

It was a woman that the poor girl wanted to be, and she declared she would wait for the man she loved. After that Lord Revelstoke went less and less into society and worked more and more strenuously in the banking house. Everywhere it was believed that the Princess and the banker had come to a tacit agreement to wait.

Meanwhile it was remarked that the Princess became every day more and more democratic. Every kind of royal personage was presented to her, but she turned her back upon them all and devoted her attention to the slums. Kodak in hand she travelled about London trying, poor soul, to break down the barriers that hedge in royalty.

While the Princess Waits.

While every one believed that the Princess Victoria was still waiting, Nannie Langhorne Shaw, the most beautiful of American women, the divorced wife of the Boston millionaire, came to London.

She went everywhere—that is, everywhere that one should go when one intends to experiment again. With her friend, Mrs. Astor, she was even recently presented at court. Time was when she couldn't have been, but under the new regime Bobbie Shaw's divorced wife was one of the beauties who made her bow at Buckingham Palace.

One wonders if the Princess Victoria saw her. Never was there a greater contrast between two women. The Princess is tall, angular and thirty-seven or thereabouts. Mrs. Bobbie Shaw is at the height of her beauty and not much more than twenty-eight years of age. She has all the characteristics of the Gibson girl. She is tall, lithe, brown-haired, blue-eyed, with broad shoulders and a small waist.

But besides being a Gibson girl she is also a Southern girl. The combination Charles Dana Gibson himself, when he married Nannie's sister, Irene, declared to be and Sandringham. He was the particular irresistible.

Like all the Langhorne girls, Mrs. Shaw is at her very most exquisite best on horseback. Very soon after she arrived in London she set about placing herself there in the best fitting habit in the very smartest hunting field.

It was Mrs. John Jacob Astor, they say, who introduced her into the very swellest of English hunting sets at Market Harborough. There Lord Revelstoke, who, besides being a most excellent banker, is a most expert horseman, has a hunting box and there he spends all his spare time.

Of course neither Mrs Nannie Shaw nor her friend, Mrs. Astor, were supposed to know or to care about this item. The lovely Mrs. Shaw was intent on riding, and the finest packs of hounds and the best hunting ground is down Market Harborough way. Thither they went.

Now to see Mrs. Shaw on horseback, taking a fence as easily as the ordinary woman would step off a curbstone, is indeed a sight that one may not forget. The average beholder would be enthusiastic about it. Lord Revelstoke represents anything but the average. He is a connoisseur and an Englishman—the combination means an expert in the ways of horses and horsewomen.

The Divorcee Carries Off the Prize.

He met Mrs. Shaw first on horseback at a meet. Her cheeks were aglow, her eyes sparkling and the lines that her habit followed perfect. He saw her start off riding a hard trotting horse as though she were being rocked in a cradle. He put up his monocle and stared after her. He had seen many American women before, but never that kind. Well, there aren't many of the Langhorne kind—we know that ourselves.

After that day and during it probably but little thought seems to have been given to the Princess Victoria by either Mrs. Nannie Shaw or Lord Revelstoke. As a matter of fact he had but little time to think of anything else if he expected to claim any share of the American divorcee's attention. On every side there were men paying court to her. He was only one of a number. Even the Grand Duke Michael of Russia was in her train. The story was abroad that he had tried to present her with a diamond brooch as a mark of his royal favor—a mark that she declined, by the way, to wear.

It was remarked that Lord Revelstoke spent less time than usual at the bank, and yet not more time with the King's daughter Victoria, who they say, has never ceased to hope that some day the royal barriers that keep her from the man she loves may be thrown down.

From the Princess Victoria to Mrs. Nannie Shaw—what a contrast! Even Mrs. Shaw herself could not fail to observe it. Some one is sure to have pointed out the Princess to her. A dowdy, pathetic looking person she is, who wanders about London generally alone. For a time she insisted upon riding in twopenny omnibuses and attending woman's rights meetings. She dressed accordingly, usually in a mackintosh and thick boots, with any sort of a hat thrust down upon her head.

What a way to wait for a man, a fastidious man of the world, a banker with an eye and a heart for beauty! Poor Victoria! She is royal and possibly so bound by traditions to believe that she may command love as well as other things. Even Mrs. Nannie Shaw with her heritage of beauty wouldn't dare to go around looking as this Princess does.

But then on Gibson girl would want to. Her knowledge of dress and her care of her person are some of the things that entitle her to being called the Gibson girl. Mrs. Nannie Shaw is always most perfectly gowned. She made a study of clothes the very minute that she found Bobbie Shaw's millions at her disposal.

It is highly probable that Lord Revelstoke has never seen anyone quite so charming. Even Bobbie Shaw acknowledged that she was charming. He added, however, "I do wish she would give the infernal South a rest."

But that was some years ago. Mrs. Shaw no longer thinks of the Sunny South. She is quite content to desert it for foggy England to reign over a fine old seat known as Monkland at Plymouth, Devon, a town residence at No. 37 Charles street, Berkeley Square, a fine income and heart of John Baring, Lord of Revelstoke. With all their beauty none of the famous Langhorne sisters have been snapped up by a title till now. They were all just plain Mrs. The first, Irene, started off with the artist, Gibson. Another married Moncure Perkins, of Richmond. Then came the fashionable wedding of Nannie to Bobbie Shaw, of Boston. Phyllis became Mrs. Reginald Brooks and there is still one unmarried sister to be disposed of.

Not a single title in the family as yet and all that beauty! It was some such remark as that, they say, that sent Mrs. Shaw over to England to see.

Rivaled a Born Princess.

The moment she became interested in Lord Revelstoke there were, of course, a dozen or more persons to whisper his romance to her ear. She to pit herself against a princess of the blood! The idea may at first have intimidated her, but a sight of the Princess must have reassured her.

No, surely Lord Revelstoke has never seen any one quite like her. He looks at her as though he never had. And she returns his glances in kind. He is one man in a thousand—a man revered and honored by other men, a hard working financier who never misses a day at his desk even to woo the woman he loves.

What a contrast to Bobbie he is!

And what a contrast to the Princess Victoria she is!

Mrs. Shaw is free, completely, absolutely so. Lord Revelstoke is free, too. The Princess has waited a long time. Possibly by now she may be convinced that she has waited in vain. When she meets the future Lady Revelstoke she will surely understand why.

Where They Have a New Kind of Bug Every Week

PHOENIX, Ariz., the great health resort for pulmonary troubles, seems to be equally attractive to the insect and reptile world. The rattlesnake, "wide-winder," Gila monster, centipede, tarantula, scorpion and lizard went there and settled long before man came. And now the fame of Phoenix has spread throughout the bug world. "Every house in this city," says the Arizona Republican, "that has an electric light at its front has been a 'bug house' for the last two or three days. In this country there is a different kind of bug bidding for popularity each week in the year. This week it is a hard-shelled, stiff-backed mahogany beetle, about an inch long, that is the favorite. It comes in droves, and is as tenacious of life as a cockroach. It is a voracious insect that is as active as a bookworm and possessing even fewer manners. It is as numerous as chinch bugs in Kansas or sinners in New York when the ill is off. It is as full of grease when stepped on as a pound of soap, and the flavor is far more repulsive. The insect probably has a dignified scientific name, but there are no dignified scientists here who will associate with it, hence it is referred to by the plain people, and very appropriately, as a stink bug. There were billions of these insects in evidence for two or three days past, but like riches, they have wings and wont last long. Last night a new kind of little pesky bug resembling a flea made its appearance.

Those Awful Paris Fashions!

"They drag back the hair so as to make it tight at the ears."

"The combination of a Louis Seize hat and a Boni de Castellane collar is too terrible for any woman."

LADY DUFF-GORDON

"I see ladies in outing costumes and Bergere hats with roses and feathers."

"American Women Must Dress at Home This Year," Declares Lady Duff-Gordon, the English Authority on Clothes.

By Lady Duff-Gordon.

AMERICAN women should dress at home this year. Why? Because the fashions here are so abominably ugly. I can recall no period when they approached even remotely their ugliness of to-day. They are so hideous that they would make even the willowy and graceful American girl look unlovable and unlovely. In England, when a woman is not well-favored, we use the phrase, "she is as ugly as Poll Ashe, who paid fourpence for shooting herself." Now the fashions of to-day would make the women of other nations than America as ill-favored looking as Poll Ashe.

I should say that the fashions devised by American women are just as likely as not to emphasize these defects.

The graceful American girl is easily dressed. She will make even an average costume a frenzied song of amorous things, while the same upon another might appear only as a bit of chiffon and pailletes.

I find that Paquin is all-powerful here, but his influence has certainly ruined the gracefulness of women, at least for this year. Many of the tea houses of Paris are centres where women of fashion congregate. Take a glance at the ladies as they enter. You will see them wear a Louis Seize hat with a collar and tie of a man of the present day. If they wore a Louis Seize collar and tie the anachronism would not be so intolerable. But the combination of a headgear of the period of Louis Seize and a Boni de Castellane collar and tie is too terrible for any woman to carry in public.

The fashions of the hour offend my sense of the fitness of things. They are not alluring. Women look well in tailor-made garments in the early hours of the morning. Such costumes should be confined to these hours. They are best suited for a hunting box or for shooting. But tailor-made costumes are horribly out of place at tea fights. Here I see ladies coming into tea in sporting dress, and over there a Bergere hat with roses and feathers. Such a combination is incongruous.

The big shoulders affected to-day are graceless and disgraceful. If any woman had shoulders like these she would be deformed. Why should a deformity be accentuated? The effect produced is a bold-fronted one. The chief charm of a woman is to be a woman, not a man or a sexless being. She should be as appealing as possible. She should glide along apparently imperceptibly; nevertheless she will be discreetly perceived. She should not be assertive. These high shoulders make a woman too assertive. And Paris, artistic Paris, the Paris of Chartran and Jean Beraud, of Gyp and Feuvrot, of Lemaitre and Coppee, of Worth and Paquin, is responsible for these monstrosities.

The whole outline of women at the present moment is made absolutely unattractive. They drag back the hair so as to make it tight at the ears; they pull a great piece over the front of their faces; they wear high linen collars which scar the throat. Women who have any respect for their throats should never think of wearing such collars, besides being injurious to health.

The big dressmakers of Paris are too avaricious. In their zeal to make money they change the styles too frequently. They do not give sufficient thought as to whether the change will make women look ridiculous or otherwise. What the women are looking like at present in Paris is too terrible for words, and I insist upon my advice to Americans—dress at home this year.

"Five-Minutes-a-Day" Exercises to Give the Sum-

By Miss May Dullere, the Physical Culture Expert.

THE "Summer Girl" of 1905 is a dainty creature, with a clear, healthily pink-and-white complexion which she keeps well protected from the sun's rays with a large sunshade to prevent sunburn and freckles, which a few season's ago were considered quite the proper thing.

The Summer girl of to-day does not forget that there is a "complexion accountjoy continued good health; neither can we expect to have a clear, healthy complexion.

Full, deep, correct breathing, together with proper and judicious exercising, is the real secret of a clear pink-and-white complexion such as the true Summer girl of to-day must needs possess.

The average woman of to-day does not know what a real genuine good thirst for water means. She rarely takes a glass of water. In fact, it never occurs to her that her system requires water to help carry off the waste matter; consequently the liver and intestines become clogged and the condition is at once registered upon the face. She grows pale and sallow, and her eyes lose their brilliancy. She thinks that it is only necessary to drink when thirsty. Let her not wait for this, but let her school herself to drink not less than eight glasses of cold water (not iced) daily.

Beauty Exercises.

Exercise No. 1—Raise the hands to the level of the shoulders (palms down) in front of the body, the width of the chest apart. Inhale very deeply while counting seven; now, while holding the breath for four counts, raise the hands straight above the head in mildair and at this point clench the fists firmly and with a quick muscular movement bring them backward and downward to the nape of the neck with clenched fists close together and muscles tense. At this point relax and exhale through the mouth to the count of six. Inhale again immediately, counting seven, and raise them again slowly high above the head (while holding the breath for four counts) over and downward to their original position. Now relax again and exhale through the mouth to the count of six.

To Improve Your Circulation.

Exercise No. 2—Assume correct standing position, this time gripping the points of the shoulders firmly. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts endeavor to pull the points of the shoulders outward and downward as far as possible and with as much strength as possible, the elbow pointing straight downward. Now relax and exhale through the mouth to count of six. Repeat this exercise five times at first and increase a count each day. It will round out the neck and take away every hollow.

Exercise No. 3.—Assume correct standing position, with fists tucked under sides of chin. Inhale through nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts, describing circles with points of elbows, keeping the fists firmly beneath the chin during the working of the elbows, which pass first forward and then upward and over, then downward, backward and over. The larger the circles described, the more benefit derived from the exercise. At this point relax, and exhale through the mouth to count of six.

This exercise may only be tried five times at first, and should be worked very gently, as it wakes up the sleeping muscles, and may cause a slight stiffness at first. But pay no attention to this. It will wear away in a day or two. It works directly upon the muscles both in front and behind the lungs, improving the circulation almost at once.

Exercise No. 4—Stand erect and stretch the arms to their fullest length down the back of the body, with palms together. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts turn the hands inward and upward until the tips of the fingers point upward on the spinal column and run them straight up the back as far as possible. Relax and pass them slowly down to their original position while counting 6.

Exercise No. 5—Assume correct standing position, with arms rigid, stretched their fullest length, one pointing straight outward in front of the body and the other pointing straight back of the body. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts swing the rigid body as far around to the left as possible without moving the feet from their original position. Now relax, and exhale through the mouth, counting six, returning slowly back to the original position. Reverse this exercise, turning the body in the opposite direction, five times each way. The arms during the swinging must be

Exercise 5—Turn the body around as far as possible without moving the feet.

Exercise 1—Bring the clenched fists down to the nape of the neck.

Exercise 2—Pull the shoulder points outward and downward.

Exercise 9—Breathe as deeply as possible ten times while in this position.

QUEEN CARMEN SYLVA.

HOW ROYALTY LEADS THE SIMPLE LIFE.

"I am always at home, and I like to see everybody hard at work about me."

"In Summer I sometimes paint the sunrise."

You Must Rise at 4 or Even 3 A. M. to Fully Appreciate Queen Carmen Sylva's Delightful and Simple Home Life.

By Her Majesty Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania.

I RISE if possible at 4, or even 3, in the morning. The sun has seldom been up before me yet. This is the time belonging to the pen. I write till 8 o'clock.

In summer I sometimes paint the sunrise, or I go to the organ or the piano to rest awhile, as my morning is not so full in Stasia as in Bucharest, and I can go on working till lunch time.

But in town, once I wake the King at 8:30, my day belongs to others. First the bath and reading of the telegrams of the day to the King, during or after breakfast, which is always very quick, in order to walk about together a little, as we don't see much of each other for many hours, the King having his Ministers from 10 to 1, and often to 1:30 every day.

During that time I have many different people to work with, the lady who is at the head of my Sisters of Charity, who are taught in the best hospitals of Europe. My Superior was for some time in St. Thomas' Hospital and also in Edinburgh, besides all the first surgeons in Germany, with whom she learned. My secretary brings the newspaper, a part of which I read, my own letters, and the numberless petitions that have to be decided upon, letters of all kinds that have to be answered; then come ladies in waiting and landed proprietors and to belonging to all kinds of societies, many also unheard of sacrifices to keep peasants especially those who distribute work to be sewn, but also a gain in much very bad I have these societies for distributing the poorest women of the town, than fifteen hundred in number, who work at home, a great deal in linen, especially for its fine for it, delicious near the skin for women all over the country; another one for making something very much like

Now I have organized a new society among the Roumanian women, which has arrived over the country, in order to make us aware of the most beautiful silk our peasant women wear, thick and heavy silk, that fails in deep, rich folds. But for that we have to wait, as it takes longer, and the women don't weave in the Summer, when the field work takes every minute, from three in the morning until eight at night. But that thick, heavy silk is delicious to the touch.

At some quarter of an hour between 12:30 and 1:30 o'clock we take a very light and quick luncheon, as the King has to see people again till 4. I generally have one audience, and then I rest in bed with books and sleep. I read very quickly; when I have a little time a book in a day, without ever skipping. I am particularly fond of English books.

At 4 o'clock the King has a cup of tea with me, and rests for a short half-hour, going with me into the garden to get a breath of air before he takes up his work till 8, often 8:30. From 5 to 8 I belong entirely to the others; three times a week there is very good music—my quartet singers, strange artists who wish to be heard by me before giving their concerts.

All the ladies of Bucharest belong to three and often five or six poor societies. I am told there are 300 poor societies in Bucharest. But I hope that, with all the work we find them to do, there will soon be much less poverty.

And so I bring before you a very simple life of hard work and sacrifice, and yet so beautiful that I would not change with the easiest in the world. I believe the easy lives are not necessarily happy ones, and that the smile lighting up a face that shows the lines of deep suffering is a joy for the very angels!

"Short daily walk in the garden with the King."

held rigid and rose to their fullest length.

Exercise No. 6—Sit on the floor with limbs extended and toes two inches apart. Grip a strong towel at the extreme ends, holding it high in mid-air. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts lean the body backward and down until lying full length upon the floor without the aid of the hands, which are still held high over the head, and the feet remaining firmly upon the floor. At this point exhale through the mouth to count of six. Inhale again immediately and rise to sitting posture without the use of the hands while holding the breath for four counts.

To Give Your Figure Style.

Do this only three times to start with and increase daily as in others. It will be found difficult at first, but with practice you will soon be able to rise and fall here with both ease and grace. This will give one absolute control of the entire body.

Exercise No. 7—Stand erect and grip the towel firmly about three feet apart, drawing it straight across the tops of the shoulders opposite the nape of the neck horizontally. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts swing the towel to right and left as far as possible with way in a circular movement, back of the head and shoulders, beginning with a downward sweep of the left hand, then slowly rising upward and over as far as the reach will permit each way. Relax the pulling and come back to the original position while exhaling through the mouth to the count of six.

This exercise should be reversed, describing the circles in opposite direction but may not be tried more than three times each way to commence with and increase daily as in others.

Exercise No. 8—Assume erect standing position, this time drawing the towel horizontally across the front of the breast bone, hands the width of the chest apart, backs of hands turning backward and with back well curved at the waist line. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts and as though endeavoring to pull the towel apart in the centre, pull it straight across and over to the left to the extreme length of the arm, alternating with the right in a see-saw motion twice to right and twice to left. Relax the pulling at this point and exhale brough the mouth to the count of six.

Do this only five times to start with, increasing daily as in others, and if the patient will do this exactly as directed she will actually feel her breast bone expand.

Exercise No. 9—Assume correct standing position, as described, and clasp the hands at the back of the neck. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts endeavor to pull the head forward with the hands resisting with the muscles of the head. Now relax and exhale through the mouth to the count of six. This may be done but five times to start, and increase as in other exercises.

Exercise No. 10—Lie flat on the floor with arms extended straight out at right angles, with the body palms downward on the floor. While lying in this position take ten deep breaths, inhaling, holding and exhaling, as described. Now raise the arms to their fullest length straight above the head, with palms turning upward, and in this position take ten more full, deep breaths as described, keeping the body's full length firmly on the floor.

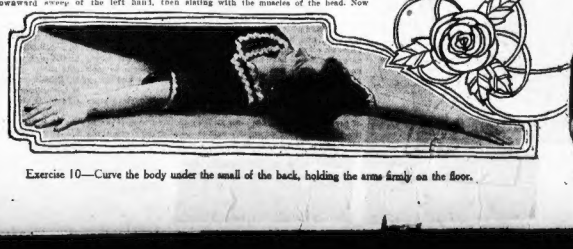
For the Hips.

Exercise No. 11—Lie full length on the floor, with arms folded back of the body directly back of the ribs, legs extended their fullest length and the body held rigid. Inhale through the nose counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts raise the trunk as high from the floor as possible, braced only by the head and heels. Relax and drop gently back to the floor without changing the position of the arms, while exhaling through the mouth to count of six.

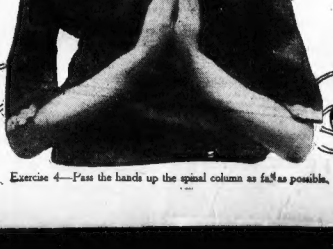
This may only be done five times to start with, and increase one daily until fifteen has been reached.

Exercise No. 12—Lie face downward on the floor, with knees bent and heels extended straight upward, reaching back with the hands as far as possible. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts, rock gently backward and forward, the body forming a cradle. Now relax the pulling and drop gently down to the floor again, while exhaling to the count of six. One or two rocking motions each way will suffice to the initial trial and may be increased daily as in others. The patient should relax completely before trying it the second time in order that she may break in the undulating motion very gently and not exhaust herself.

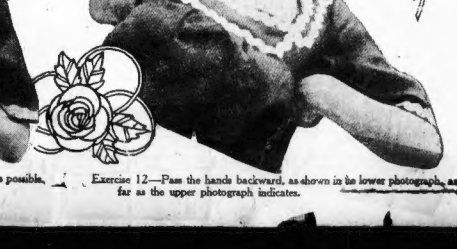
Exercise No. 13—Stand erect, with feet tucked under in virgin. Inhale through the nose, counting seven, and while holding the breath for four counts, and with muscles held rigid, reach the fists straight backward under the armpits and downward to the utmost length. At this point exhale through the mouth to the count of six. Inhale again immediately, counting seven, and while holding again for four counts bring the clenched fists forward and upward again, raising them across under the armpits to their original position. This to be done five or six times to start with and increased daily as in others.



Exercise 10—Curve the body under the small of the back, holding the arms firmly on the floor.



Exercise 4—Pass the hands up the spinal column as far as possible.



Exercise 12—Pass the hands backward, as shown in the lower photograph, as far as the upper photograph indicates.

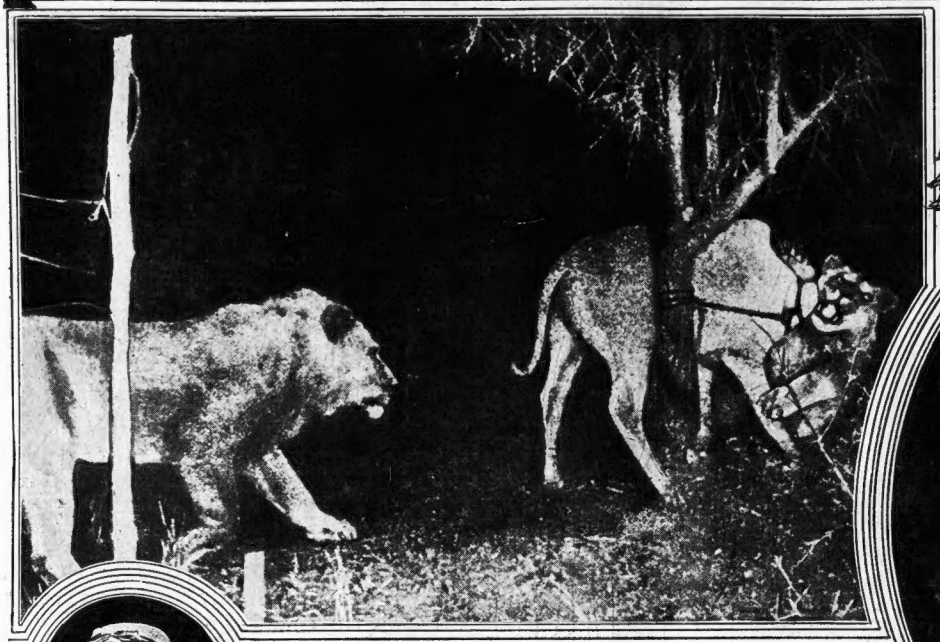
FIRST ACTUAL FLASHLIGHT PHOTOGRAPHS O

JUST HOW THE LIONS OF THE AF OTHER FIERCE BEASTS OF PREY SHOWN IN UNIQUE PIC



"While a honess killed a steer with a terrible gash in the neck a male lion dashed up from behind. In an instant the flashlight illuminated this scene of the battle for existence."

"Unspeakable was my joy when I succeeded during an hour of the night in catching on my plate three old lionesses drinking at a brook."

Herr C. G. Schillings, who took the pictures.

By CYRUS C. ADAMS, Secretary of the National Geographical Society.

FIFTEEN years ago a young German named C. G. Schillings became known in his native land for his remarkable love of animals and his unusual knowledge of animal life. Since that time his ample wealth has been freely used to promote his work.

More fortunate than many other men of science, the money question has never bothered him when he fitted out for the long collecting tours in Africa which have enriched seven of the zoological museums of Germany and Austria.

During Schillings's three expeditions, between 1898 and 1904, he has lived over four years in the depths of tropical Africa. His parties have numbered as high as 135 men, chiefly native blacks, and not a man in his service has been permitted to fire a shot excepting to get meat for the pot.

He has had many men to carry his baggage and prepare his specimens, but for scientific purposes Schillings was the only hunter. He permitted no animal life to be taken wantonly, for he abhors such practices.

When Schillings returned home last year he already was famous for having made the largest and finest collections of animal life that ever came out of Africa; but it became known the other day that he had acquired a new and unique claim to distinction.

Photographs of wild animals in parks and menageries are common enough, but the great ambition of this naturalist was to catch on the camera the true and actual life of beasts and birds as they live in the boundless freedom of their homes; and he has wonderfully succeeded.

CAUGHT THE LION SPRINGING UPON HIS PREY.

Everybody began to talk of Schillings's book "Mit Blitzlicht und Buchse" ("With Flashlight and Rifle") as soon as it was off the press. The Germans had never seen such pictures before. Wallihan and one or two other Americans have made remarkable camera shots at our big Western game, but Schillings is the only European who has entered this new photographic field, and his results surpass anything hitherto done in this line.

Most of the 302 photographs in his book are of the animals of tropical Africa, showing the truth the camera reveals of their natural life on the grassy plains, the mountain slopes and in the fetid swamps and thick forests.

We see the lion actually springing on his prey or lurking for a victim at the drinking places; rhinoceroses bathing in the swamp, feeding in the open or resting in the shade; hippopotamuses in the jungle or the river; the sleek leopard, calmly noting that nothing is doing, though he has been shot by a camera; hyenas at their scavenger work, and one strong fellow dragging away the body of a donkey; flocks of storks about to take wing for their summer watering places in southern Europe; and elephants, zebras, giraffes, gnus, antelopes, gazelles and many others, in troops or singly, all going the ways and acting the parts to which nature assigned them.

ALL NIGHT IN THE JUNGLE, ARMED WITH A CAMERA.

In many cases he was able to approach the game near enough to catch them with an ordinary snapshot. At other times he stood a half mile or more away; but so large a shadow of the animals was thrown on the plate by his telescopic camera that in the picture they appear to be only a few rods distant.

Many of his most remarkable views were taken by flashlight. All the large animals of Africa whose food is the game they kill are most active at night, and to catch them with his camera Schillings was compelled to turn darkness into day with the vivid flashes from his apparatus.

Night after night he sat alone in the forest or the open, under the stars or in the drenching rain, with heaps of thorn scrub piled around to screen him from view when the flash for a moment brought the brightness of noontime. His camp was always within hailing distance, about a quarter of a mile away.

HEARD THE SOFT FOOTSTEPS OF A LION.

Sometimes he would keep his vigil near some rock or other small eminence beside the well-trodden path along which the animals travel to the drinking places. The lion especially prefers to spring upon his prey from a little elevation above the path, and he is most likely to lie in wait where these rocks or other points of vantage occur. At other times the naturalist would have his bush fence constructed at the spring itself, where the path touched it, and at such places he took flashlight photographs of zebras, gnus, antelopes and many other animals.

On many occasions, however, he tied a small African steer or a donkey to a tree or stake as a tempting bait for beasts of prey, and some of his most striking pictures were taken at the tragic moment when the catlike prowler was crouching for a spring or actually on the neck of his poor victim.

Throughout his book the naturalist indignantly protests against the ruthless slaugh seems overflowing with love first view it seems strange timents should expose to d leopard the helpless animal doom. He explains it in th

These long, fruitless waits in the jungle and the unusual exposure in a trying climate were hard to bear, and his health suffered. He attempted no work for a couple of days after a night given to animal photography.

But there were moments of thrill and joy to relieve the tedium as he sat, watch in hand. He would hear the faintest sounds of footfalls near, a little crunching of the grass and sometimes just a bit of a purr; he would flash his light, and the sensitized plate would catch a lion crouching for a spring, or in the air, or on the neck of his victim.

HOW THE GREAT CATS HUNT AT NIGHT.

Unless the bite was already inflicted, when the flash came the victim was spared for the time. No animal, however hungry, could see that sudden blaze of white without losing his nerve. The marauder invariably quit the scene at once. One flashlight immediately followed another on a certain occasion. The first revealed a lion crouching for a spring; the second showed nothing but the end of his retreating tail and a much-astonished donkey.

"So great is the agility of the giant cat that in the tiny fraction of a second's warning noise given by the machine he was almost able to get out of the camera's range."

Another view shows a lion in the air making straight for the poor donkey, and still another shows the king of beasts inflicting the fatal bite. All of them were cheated out of their supper, for they fled into the jungle to think over that remarkable phenomenon of the flashlight.

Schillings says the lion is bent on business only when he is hungry. When his stomach is full he has no unkindly feelings for anything unless men attack him. In his experience the male lion usually hunts alone, but three or four of the females go out hunting together, and when one makes an attack the others are lurking in the outskirts to prevent an escape.

During the day the lions sleep or rest in the concealment of the scrub or under the shade of the trees in the deep recesses of the forests. This is the reason they are so seldom seen except by men who make a business of hunting them. Most of the explorers who have crossed Africa from sea to sea have not been hunters, and some of them have been two years on the journey and never saw a lion.

THE OSTRICH KICKS THE LION INTO SUBMISSION.

Schillings wonders if the comparative quiet of the zoological gardens is favorable to the development of the shaggy mane which we usually associate with the lordly king of the jungle. The naturalist's long journeys took him inland from the coast of German East Africa to Victoria Nyanza, the largest of the central African lakes, but among all the lions he saw, photographed or killed, there were only two or three with manes.

The natives say that in their fights with other animals and their wanderings through the thorny scrub their manes are torn off. However this may be, the necks of most of the males are as bare as those of the females.

There is only one thing of which the lion is afraid, and that is the ostrich. The bird is more fleet than the quadruped, and it can deliver its terrible kick with the impact of a pugilist's blow and spring away till it gets another opening. Such tactics naturally disgust the superior being.

The lion has a weakness, however, for ostrich eggs and will make a meal off them whenever the vigilance of the parent birds is a bit relaxed. Schillings saw him once with the tempting pile of eggs before him, and he was about to regale himself when the owners of the property appeared, and the beast slunk off like a whipped cur.

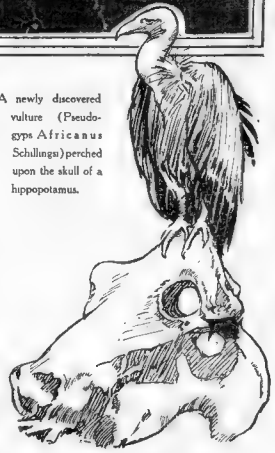
There was some element of danger in flashlight photography, but nothing compared with the risk of hunting such game as the rhinoceros, lion and leopard. Schillings was well hidden within his fence of brush, and the enemy saw nothing but the marvellous light, which scared him out of his wits.

THE RHINOCEROS IS THE MOST DANGEROUS TO HUNT.

We might not enjoy waiting in the darkness for dangerous beasts that were likely to come almost within touch, but Schillings didn't seem to mind it. He excuses the rather blurred outline of one of his lions on the ground that the animal was within ten feet of him—rather too close to the camera. If most of us were placed in the same position we should probably agree that the animal was altogether too near.

The author thinks it is an open question whether the hunting of the lion, leopard, buffalo, elephant or rhinoceros is the most dangerous. On the whole, however, he thinks that if he were hunting without supporting rifles in the hands of really great hunters he would rather take his chances with any of them than with the rhinoceros

This animal is remarkably fleet, considering its bulk, and when it makes a charge it is next to impossible to get away from it. Then is the time when a comrade with a good gun and steady nerve is needed to distract the animal's attention. The pictures show this formidable animal, all unconscious that a stranger is near, digging in the mud of the swamps, feeding on the grasses of the plains or resting in the shade.



A newly discovered vulture (Pseudogyps Africanus Schillings) perched upon the skull of a hippopotamus.

CURIOUS FRIENDSHIPS AMONG DIFFERENT ANIMALS.

Among the most interesting pictures are those showing the broad sweep of the East African plains, with herds of all kinds of the grass-feeding game animals. They live in amity and wander far and wide together. They strike up curious friendships. For three weeks Schillings watched two elephants and a giraffe that were inseparable companions, and he shows them on one of his smaller plates

The zebras and the gnus have a most kindly feeling for one another, and the various gazelles and antelopes join the crowds of other game and like their company. The grass is the favorite food of the lion, and the natives prefer zebra to any other meat excepting elephant and hippopotamus steaks.

The elephant lives on the leaves, bark and small branches of the trees, and the pictures show one of the big bull trees of this animal. He tears down many a tree to get at the leaves and tender twigs at the top, and as he hasn't mind of modern forestry he fails to plant trees to make good his destruction.

The author says that the day is surely coming when the great game of Africa will be extinct. They embrace many of the noblest specimens of the animal kingdom; and now that they have vanished in the larger part of Africa and are likely to disappear wholly within the next generation or two, Schillings has done a signal service in procuring these remarkable pictures illustrating their manner of life in the regions where they once wandered in countless numbers.

The Downfall of Mrs. James Brown Potter.

LIKE Mrs. Langtry, in Poverty; She Is Broken Down, Disgraced and Snubbed by Her Married Daughter---Startling Parallel of These Two Favorites of King Edward, Once Petted and Rich, Now Forsaken and Poor.

James Stillman Offered to Pay Her Debts for His Son's Wife's Sake if Mrs. Potter Would Agree to Permanent Banishment from America.

MRS. JAMES BROWN POTTER, Mrs. Lily Langtry, both petted society beauties, later both actresses famous in legitimate drama on two continents while enjoying the marked favor of King Edward of England, and now at last both sadly down, bring in comparative poverty and rejected professionally and socially.

The latest chaos from London completes the startling parallel furnished by the unfortunate careers of the American beauty and the English beauty. Made penniless and plunged deeply in debt by the failure of a series of first class drama le productions at the Savoy Theatre, of which she was lessee, manageress and star, ignored as a star by the important managers of England and America, without social influence forgotten by her old friend the King, and snubbed by Banker James Stillman, her daughter's father in law, Mrs Potter is trying to earn her bread as a vaudeville artist in a London music hall.

Her beautiful home at Maidenhead England, has been thrown into the courts by her creditors, and Alfred Yoskil, who was her banker in the Savoy Theatre enterprise is charged with stealing $62,000 of trust funds in a final effort to check her downfall.

Go for into vaudeville is regarded as the last resort of those who were once stage favorites. Actresses of inborn talent and the widest experience have failed to please the vaudeville audiences. How about one whose beauty—now faded—was her main professional asset? Yet this change is a fact, that stands between her and destitution.

Mrs. Langtry a downfall preceded that of Mrs. Potter by nearly a year. She too is completely estranged from her daughter, and, to make her social downfall, all the more marked, that daughter, an unlikely one in the set of royalty by whom she herself is forgotten, duly became Mrs. Langtry was more cynical than the American beauty more of a philosopher, she was able to go into retirement with a stipend which will save her from abject poverty. When she saw that the crash was inevitable she managed to keep from the grasp of creditors jewels, yachts, houses and carriages, houses, and some other gifts of princes and was enabled administer and upon the proceeds of these she now lives, ostracised and forgotten, but maternally comfortable, in a London apartment.

The only difference between them is that Mrs. Langtry spared herself a private poverty and the last humiliation of going into vaudeville.

Exchanged with the Vicar.

At the time that she was reading Ella Wheeler Wilcox poems in the Vicar of Bonchurch's church to assist the venerable dean to popularize his services he was writing for her a literary production lacking all the elements of a play. The exchange, though brilliant, was not equable. The actress drew large audiences for the clergyman, but the clergyman emptied the theatre for the actress. The run of "For Church and State" was one of four nights.

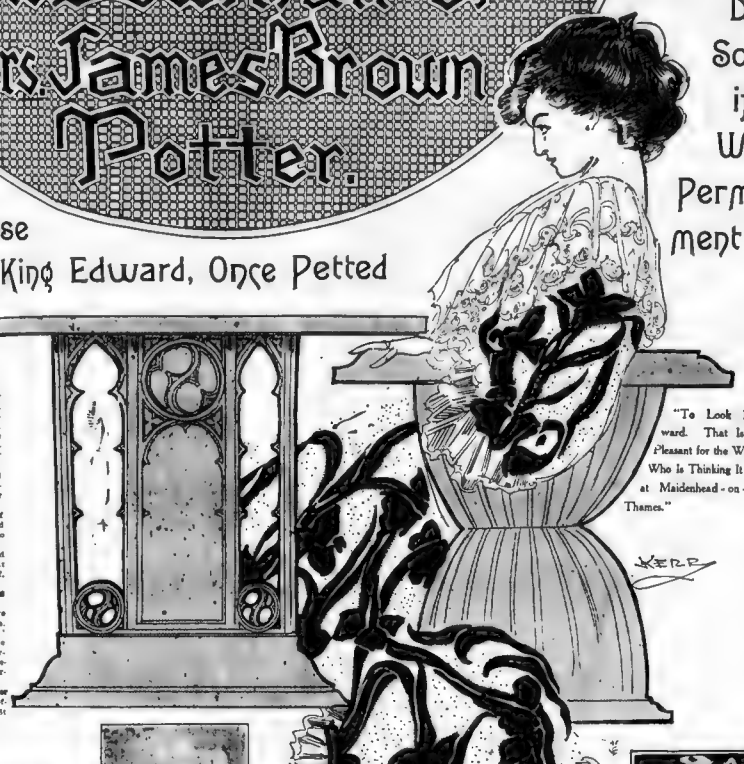
Again that quality of diverse names asserted itself and Mrs. Potter followed a failure with what she hoped would produce a tremendous sensation. Mrs. Stuart Duval's amateurish effort, "The Golden Light," embellished as it was by Lady Duff Gordon's spectacular sensational gowns, named "First Love," "Caprice," "Pique" and "Incessant Soft Desire," was of slightly shorter life than "For Church and State."

Then she tried dramatized versions of the operas "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." A third time the hoodoo perched upon the footlights of the Savoy.

An average actress would have paused here to take counsel of prudence. "Is it possible," she would have asked herself, "that London is tired of me?" have asked herself, "that London is tired of me?"

But the quality to which the critics have different names permitted no such question. Mrs. Potter would produce "La Du Barry." She had heard of the munificence of the American setting for the story of the favorite of the French king. Mrs. Potter resolved to outdo Belasco. She merely embarrassed Mrs. Potter.

There was not a shilling left for another production. Creditors were filling the office of the Savoy and the cottage at Maidenhead. Creditors were filling the office of the Savoy and the cottage at Maidenhead. Creditors were filling the office of the Savoy and the cottage at Maidenhead.



"To Look Backward. That Is Not Pleasant for the Woman Who is Thinking It Over at Maidenhead-on-the-Thames."

Four of Mrs. Potter's Favorite Photographs of Herself in Different Stages of Her Career.

COPYRIGHT OF TALMA.

James Stillman, Jr., who, when she was seven years old, her mother had forsaken for the stage, had no future in her own right. Besides she has a manager. She talked long with her young husband. In turn he talked long with his father. The elder Stillman sent brief consent, based upon an ante-nuptial condition. He would cable the money on condition that Mrs. Potter never come to America again and that she never appear in any music hall. Upon reading which Mrs. Potter burst into angry tears and cabled the elder Stillman "No."

A last desperate effort she made. She would lessen her life for the amount required to produce a fifth play at the Savoy. But the insurance companies declined to take the risk.

Then appeared Maxine Elliott, also an American, also beautiful, always successful. Miss Elliott wanted a London playhouse. Mrs. Potter sub-let her lease to Miss Elliott. Mrs. Potter went and Miss Potter did, and, while the Savoy is crowded nightly by London, anxious to see the new American beauty, Mrs. Potter has gone to the country to think it over.

To look forward is not inspiring to Mrs Potter. The shadow of years and of failure has fallen upon her.

No offers from managers of the leading and chief attractions come in the mails to Maidenhead. Dramatic managers are shrewd folks, tinged with superstition.

The music hath, perhaps? Or America? And there it is the vaudeville houses that beckon her. She would be featured, the American vaudeville managers assure her, she was saying. "I made a hit in 'Mlladi' Featured on bills between May Yohe and the educated bears. Mrs. Potter striked the attic surface of the Marie Antoinette table with this clenched hand. Not to her brief biography begins. "I have been America. Never unless she must. In America is Kyrie Bellew, the actor and tutor, friend from whom she parted in one of the quarrels that Mrs. Potter and Mrs. Potter did, while the Savoy Bellew is wonderfully successful. America in her former husband, married to another. In America is her daughter. At the thought of her Mrs. Potter bends lower over the table. Her baby Fifi is grown up, is married, and is was Fifi's father-in-law who had asked her not to come to America.

To look backward. That is not pleasant for the woman who is thinking it over at Maidenhead-on-the-Thames.

She gave a long glance backward at her self under happier auspices. It was while I used to declaim on every possible occasion, and I can see myself lying down to a little creek—Mud Creek it was called—and apostrophising it with outstretched arms in the words of Macaulay.

"O Tiber, Father Tiber,

To whom we Romans pray,

A Roman's life, a Roman's arms

Take thou in charge this day."

Of her marriage, in 1877, when she was twenty, to James Brown Potter, a coffee broker, with offices at No. 59 Wall street, Potters spent a part of each year at No. 37 West Thirty-seventh street, New York, the rest at Tuxedo, which they helped to build. Nothing of ten quiet years that most women would regard as the most beautiful of their lives, the first decade of their wifehood. The Potters spent a part of each year at No. 37 West Thirty-seventh street, New York, the rest at Tuxedo, which they helped to build. Nothing of ten quiet years that most women would regard as the most beautiful of their lives, the first decade of their wifehood. The Potters spent a part of each year at No. 37 West Thirty-seventh street, New York, the rest at Tuxedo, which they helped to build.

Nothing appears in the autobiography of her antipathy for her husband's uncle, Bishop Henry Potter, and his reciprocal non admiration of her. She was content at this time to observe: "There are good and bad of all sorts through the forest every class, from bishops to ballet girls. As there are some bishops better than ballet girls, so there are some ballet girls better than some bishops."

Scandalizes with "'Ostler Joe."

In her autobiography she is silent, too, about the birth of Fifi Potter. She leaps to a cruicial incident in her life.

"It was at Secretary Whitney's, in Washington, that I recited G. R. Sims's beautiful little poem, 'Ostler Joe.' It made a most unbelievable sensation, a number of very prudish dames getting up and walking out of the room. Nothing on earth can approach the self-righteous prudery of the American woman, especially if she is unravelled."

Nor in this autobiography is there reference to the frank letters written to her husband a few months after her much-discussed reading of "Ostler Joe."

"Dear Jim—All I care about is my art. I wrote to your father and mother about my intention of going on the stage. I have received no answer. If I receive their approval I will be pleased. If I do not I can get along very well without it. Your father and mother are an aggravation to me. Let Tuxedo go. I live there with those stiff-backed people. Mrs. James Brown Potter is going to be loved from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I intend to do as I please, come what will."

"Dear Jim—You know that I am going to do as I want. How silly you are! The time has come when I intend to have my own way. I love my art better than my life."

Husband Saw Her Debut.

She cabled her husband of an offer from the Haymarket Theatre management. He cabled his refusal. She wrote: "My mind is made up. I decline to cancel my contract. I am high in my art now. It is a big move. I cable you not to come. I can manage my own affairs to suit myself. If you take an interest in my work I will be pleased to write you at all times and tell you about it. I have made up my mind to do what is nearest my heart."

It is inconceivable that, as Mrs. Potter sits by her Marie Antoinette table, thinking, thinking, these letters loom larger in retrospect than at the time they were lightly written.

She reviews, doubtless, in the blue boudoir with its touch of gold—she is luxurious and sensuous, and "like a touch of gold in a room"—her debut as Ann Sylvester in Wilkie Collins's "Man and Wife" at the Haymarket Theatre in London, and her tour of America in "Romeo and Juliet" and "Antony and Cleopatra," a tour that was indifferently far from a triumph. James Brown Potter, pale and distraught, waited restlessly in the foyer. He was a manly fellow. He wanted to give at least perfunctory countenance to his wife's ambitions, and friends of both looking from the stage to him said, "Poor Jim!"

In retrospect Mrs. Potter sees at this time her meeting with little Fifi and her nurse on the street in New York. She remembers her own exclamation: "I shouldn't have known the child if she hadn't been with you, Mary." There was but one meeting with Fifi after this. Her father permitted her to call on her mother at the Fifth Avenue Hotel one afternoon.

"America never liked me, but London—London was so kind, until"—

Mrs. Potter is not quite sure when it began. Was it when she had the quarrel with Stephen Phillips because he complained that her playing of Calypso in his poem dreamt "Ulysses" was too forced? But as actress and a Mrs. James Brown Potter—she almost forgets there is another Mrs. James Brown Potter now, and that she should write herself down as Mrs. Cora Urquhart Potter, or at most Mrs. James Brown Potter—must occasionally assert herself.

Was it when she appeared in "The Ghetto," which was so precipitate a failure, almost as precipitate as the four last plays at the Savoy?

In less than two years Mrs. Potter will celebrate the passing of the second decade since she forsook all for the stage—and she will be fifty years old.

Afternoon Gowns

BY MRS OSBORN,

CREATOR OF FASHIONS FOR THE FASHIONABLE WOMEN OF AMERICA.

Elaborate Afternoon Gowns of the Summer. Rich and Expensive Hand Embroideries Mark the Summer Gowns of the Smart Woman. French Styles and Open English Embroideries a Happy Combination.

A.—Light green mulle afternoon gown, embroidered in different shades of grapes and vines.

B.—Smart gown of batiste, trimmed with embroidery.

C.—Fetching gown of novelty wool, trimmed with buttons.

D.—Rich afternoon gown for receiving, in ruby color, embroidered in silver.

THIN, soft fabrics reign supreme this Summer for afternoon gowns, and the woman who does not look pretty in such a gown is a hopeless case even for a beauty doctor and facial concoctions.

Such filmy flounces of embroidery, that is so fine and so open in pattern as to look flower-like in its beauty! Such softly drawn folds of materials as drape the figures of well dressed women in graceful lines, that no artist could improve upon! Such delicately blended colors as lend a glow and life to this season's costumes! One might exclaim for hours over the points of beauty in this Summer's gowns and still leave half the tale untold.

Writers say that men are growing closer to Nature, and I can safely affirm that women are, too, so far as dress is concerned, that harmonizes with the spirit of Nature and borrows from her all that is fairest and best in blended colorings and simple moral grace.

Women have cast off the white draperies which floated about them in harmony with the white snows that wrapped Dame Nature not long since, and have donned ailment as fair as the flowers of Spring—raiment often repeating in decoration as well as coloring the first apple blossoms of the year; the purpling violets and veils of mauve-tinted wistaria, the young green grass and wild forget-me-nots and the crimsoning buds of the maple trees. All these colorings glow softly in the gowns of well-dressed women, and, by way of contrast, shadowy folds of sheer black stuffs and misty lines of white meet the eye, there being more shadows than white highlights.

Among Summer gowns not is very smart, and chic arrangement will be greeted with delight by women of small means, for if there is anything cheap, pretty and durable it is net. Just think, one can buy net for fifty-nine cents a yard, and it is double width, and five or six yards will make a very full dress. Isn't that cheap? A bit of lace for the yoke and cuffs is all the trimming necessary, although more trimming can be added at pleasure.

Dotted nets are not anything like as smart as plain ones are this Summer, and point d esprit is better than dotted nets for gowns.

The fad of the season is to buy the net in white and cream—it rarely comes in any other plain color—and then dye it any color one pleases, such as light blue, mauve, pink and yellow. Smartest of all is the cinnamon brown net, for it takes on glowing lines that are very attractive. It only costs a dollar to have the material dyed, and then one can make up the gown. The natural cream colored net is lovely in itself, and certain gowns made of pure white nets are charming, but the colored varieties are perferred for afternoon wear.

Net Gowns Are Simple.

One of the charms about net gowns is their simplicity. It is surprising how effecting and dressy a perfectly simple gown of this fabric can look. One such gown is made with a plain skirt, gathered several times below the belt to make it set pearly about the hips. The goods is two yards in width, and so few seams appear. The skirt is simply finished with a deep hem and a draped ceinture of white liberty satin or silk is to be worn with it.

This skirt [illegible] underskirt of [illegible] such as [illegible] materials, pompadoured in lovely [illegible] floral effects and colorings, are the fad. Taffeta is the only stiff silk fashionable among afternoon gowns, and the French save set the vogue of pompadoured taffetas that are quite as charming as anything ever seen at the French court, and remind one a bit of the Dolly Varden styles of our youth.

Could one fancy a cooler looking or more beautiful afternoon gown for early Summer than the one shown in figure A? It is of light green mulle, as clear and soft as the young willow branches that float on the breeze like a veil over the face of Spring. The skirt is gathered quite full to the belt and tucked in four wide tucks around the lower portion, at and above the knees. Upon the lowest tuck and on down to the edge of the gown—which is long all around—is a wide design of embroidery in several shades of green. The pattern consists of vine leaves, stems and tendrils, and large clusters of green grapes in artistic shadings.

The vine and grape decoration is carried out around the top of the bodice, with tendrils creeping down upon the short sleeves.

Circular Skirts Must Be Long.

The bodice is quite plain around the top, where the embroidery is, and the neck is filled in with pleats of palest green chiffon merging into a white line at the top. Pure white would, of course, do as well, and the material may be gauze, very sheer lawn, or something of that sort if one does not want chiffon.

The little sleeves of the bodice are trimmed around the edges with a fold and are slit up the outer side in two points. A puff of the material of which the yoke is made forms the under sleeve, which terminates at the elbow.

The bodice is gathered under a wide, draped ceinture, and the gown is given an added touch of color and warmth by the rose placed at the belt. The same tint of pompadour yoke trims the green leghorn hat, both under and over the brim. Altogether nothing more dainty could well be conceived in the way of a gown.

Of course the rose are pale green, with a few small rosebuds, or a single spray, upon the instep; and green tops are made to the shoes.

A simpler but very smart gown is shown in figure B. This has a circular skirt, fitted on the hips and flaring at the bottom, with a seam in front and made long all around. The circular skirt does not hang well except when built long all around.

Beginning at the knees three flounces of embroidered batiste, of the same tint of cream color as the gown, trim the lower part of the skirt. These are all the same size, and the points of the embroidery upon the lower flounce fall over the hem around the bottom of the skirt. An additional pretiness is lent the flounces in the little puffing of batiste which runs around the top of each flounce.

The bodice has a high yoke and stock of lace with a partly surpliced bodice, having lace turned back upon the surplice effect like a collar, coming to a point in front. The upper edge of the lace is outlined by green velvet (although any other color may be chosen), and three small green velvet bows, of graduated sizes, are set upon the front of the bodice.

The material is pleated slightly just over the armhole on the shoulder and again on the front seams at and below the bust. It is drawn around the waist in a sort of ceinture effect and fastened to one side of the front. Of course such a bodice is draped upon a fitted and boned lining and appears quite loose above the top of the ceinture.

Very pretty sleeves add to the attractiveness of this gown. They are made with three narrow and three wider puffs from the shoulder seam to the elbow, and the gathering of these makes the rest of the sleeve puff prettily. Two deep, upstanding flounces of pointed lace are put on a fitted band above the elbow, and a similar flounce hangs below them. A green velvet band and bow trim the elbow.

A hat of green and cream color should be worn with such a gown, and there would be no special objection to having a touch of rose color added, if one pleased.

In figure C a much more simple but not less smart afternoon gown is shown. It may be made of any of the pretty novelty wools which are to be had this season, or in some sorts of silk. The wools come in very thin qualities and have the appearance of ginghams and little cotton checks, only they are prettier than either.

Afternoon Gowns Rich.

In figure C the check is in pale, soft tints of mauve etched in more hair lines of color, and the skirt is made to clear the ground in walking length, gathered full to the belt and made to turn forward in a pleat on each side the front. Pretty effects are maintained upon the seams of the gores by forward turning pleats held in place by rows of buttons. As will be seen, the buttons are set so that the front rows come well down upon the skirt and the back rows set quite high on the hips.

The bodice has several wide pleats held down by buttons in a similar fashion, and the bottom of the bodice is gathered to the belt.

A collar, in two tucked points of linen, finishes the back of the bodice in coat fashion, and a small linen cuff, a new one, finishes off a very pretty sleeve. It has its front and back pieces drawn forward over its puff just above the elbow, and fastened at the meeting with a row of buttons. A white Hungerin stock and little cuff give the touch of white needed to the costume, and a draped ceinture is worn around the waist. Of course this sort of costuming could be made up in a plain color and also in black or white. In white linen of a medium light weave it would look very well.

For receiving at home in the afternoon figure D offers a very good model of a gown. It has very simple lines and depends for its elaborateness upon its color and the richness of its embroidered decoration.

The material is ruby chiffon silk and is gathered to the belt and finished with a deep, invisible hem. All the lower part of the gown is embroidered over with large silver roses and the belt is of silver tissue. This also forms the border along the edges of the surplices, which cross both in the back and in front over a yoke of lace. This yoke may also be of tissue, lightly embroidered, if one pleases, or of some filmy material suitable for the purpose.

Small pleats hold the top of the sleeve fast upon the arm, and these are released in a puff which is confined above the elbow by a band of silver tissue.

One can not go far wrong in making an afternoon gown rich in color, elaborate in embroidered designs and fine in materials. This year the afternoon gowns are made more on the order of what evening and dinner gowns formerly were, but there is a line of distinction that is very clearly marked.

Throw Away Your Tooth Brushes—And Why.

A COUPLE of years ago a physician in a Western State contributed to the birth of millions by daring to say that the bath tub was the most dangerous enemy, by the unnatural habit of washing ourselves the human race had upset all Nature's plan. Now comes Dr. E. Fuller with a startling article against the tooth brush in the Dietetic Gazette. The tooth brush, says Dr Fuller, has been in vogue for a long time without being suspected of doing any mischief. Nowhere is it used with such vigor as it is here, and nowhere is the demand for artificial teeth and their employment as prevalent as in this country. The tooth brush, in my opinion, is a potent factor in the causation of many ills, and I consider the matter of too great importance to be overlooked.

The mouth, as is well known, is teeming with microbes. If we examine a drop of sputum under the microscope it will be found to be loaded with bacteria. Pieces of mucel are frequently found in the sputum of healthy people and in addition there may be other pathogenic micro-organisms from various sources. The means of safeguarding against infection by these micro-organisms is to keep the mucous membrane intact, wherever there is a breach of surface, however insignificant it may be, infection may take place, especially if the system be in such a state that the resisting power is lessened, such, for instance, as extreme fatigue, hunger, etc. I think we can safely say that in a number of infectious diseases the infection is introduced through the mouth. The local inflammatory affections are, of course, due to some local infection, as diphtheria, scarlatina, etc., are frequently primarily caused by local infection of the mouth.

Now, the tooth brush is first of all always loaded with micro-organisms; in order to make it aseptic it would have to be submitted either to strong chemical germicides or to prolonged boiling, as some microbes are extremely resisting, especially the sporulent ones. The tooth brush is seldom, if ever, properly sterilized. It is simply rinsed in cold or hot water, which is altogether inadequate. Then, too, the brush is usually stiff, the hairs get in between the gums, causing an abrasion of the gums, and thus one practically inoculates himself with microbes. If they happen to be virulent ones they will surely cause disease. For instance, a nurse attending a case of diphtheria may have blown into her mouth some particle of the patient's sputum loaded with microbes. She uses a tooth brush which causes some abrasions of the mucous membrane, and thus inoculates herself with the disease.

Antiseptics for the mouth will hardly do, and it is practically impossible to sterilize this cavity on account of its many nooks and corners. The ordinary mouth washes and powders are hardly strong enough to have any effect on bacteria. In addition, the tooth brush frequently causes local irritation and painful gums. Such a case recently came to my office, the patient complaining of extreme tenderness of the lower gums, which entirely disappeared on discarding the toothbrush. I believe that the greater prevalence of affections of the teeth in this country as compared with Europe is due to the tooth brush, which is more frequently and vigorously used here than anywhere else in the world. To see a middle-aged or even young person in this country with healthy teeth is a rarity. Even young ladies of eighteen usually expose to sight one or more artificial teeth made of gold.

Dr. Fuller assures us that he has no objections to cleanliness, but he has a substitute for the brush to recommend. Here it is.

I have found that for cleaning the teeth sanitol absorbent cotton is best. A piece of cotton, about the size of a walnut, should be taken, soaked in fresh water, and made into a pledget, tooth powder put on it, and holding it between the thumb and index fingers, the teeth thoroughly cleansed. It will be a little awkward, of course, at first but with a little experience one may easily manage it.

The tooth brush, to be safe, must be disinfected each time it is used. For reasons that are apparent, it is not wise to use as strong antiseptics as it is take [illegible] mouth. If one is determined to [illegible] tooth brush, it should be given [illegible] boiling it for at least half an hour

The Expected is About to Happen

Peter of Servia, Who Was Behind the Murderous Plot That Brought Him a Crown Dripping with Blood, Must Now Meet His Fate at the Hands of Assassins or Flee for His Life

KING PETER OF SERVIA

Belgrade, Servia, June 1.

What the expected about to happen? Will King Peter flee for his life, or remain in his palace to be assassinated on the first anniversary of the assassination of the king on whose throne he sits as the prearranged result of that bloody night of June 11, 1903?

These are not idle questions, here in Belgrade, as King Peter himself well knows. He has tried to perform the impossible—to obey his fellow conspirators, the actual murderers of Alexander and Draga, who cleared the throne for him, and to win the regard of his subjects—and, of course, has failed. For months past he has awaited with nervous apprehension the first return of June 11 fully understanding the Servian love of dramatic effect in dealing with royalty, and already the signs are more than ominous.

During the week prior to the killing of King Alexander and Queen Draga there were no such public evidences of displeasure toward the ruling monarch as are now manifested toward King Peter. He hardly dares show himself outside his palace, and, remembering the first attempt of Alexander's assassins to poison him, he eats of no dish that has not first been tasted by another in his presence.

Most nerve trying of all, he does not know in what direction to look for the danger that overshadows him. Will his rule of less than a year furnish the instrument to at once vacate the throne and avenge Alexander and Draga, or will the assassins themselves turn avengers?

The murderers of Alexander and Draga are all about him. He has never been able to rid himself of them. For that reason he is ostracized by every one of his brother monarchs of Europe. At the time of his coronation King Edward and the Emperors of Russia, Germany and Austria informed him plainly that before their governments could entertain the ordinary relations with Servia under his rule he must clear himself of the imputation of having been the instigator of the assassination, or a party to it. These monarchs said, in effect

Murderers All About Him.

"The only way you can clear yourself is to at once sever all relations with the officers who took part in the massacre, deprive them of their commissions, and either bring them to justice or exile them from your kingdom."

Some of these things has King Peter done. He remains surrounded by the very men whose hands are stained with the blood of his predecessor. They continue to occupy the highest offices in the government and at his court, and the outraged people know that they influence, probably dictate to, his whole policy.

The sentiment has been widely published that the conspirators against the lives of King Alexander and Queen Draga built their hands until one of them had gone to Geneva and notified their whole plot to Peter Karageorgevitch, the pretender to Servia's throne, and obtained his acceptance of all the conditions upon which he might succeed upon the murder of Alexander. These conditions included a new constitution based upon liberal principles, framed by the conspirators.

The inference now is that the bloody-handed men who rule Servia's ruler possess documentary evidence that King Peter is as guilty as themselves. It is practically certain that his subjects believe this, for they treat him as a puppet and despise him accordingly. The King is not deceived about his position. Evidences exist that he even foresaw the present situation.

Offered His Son in His Stead.

After the murder of the King and Queen, when the Servian Commission went to him in Geneva to publicly offer him the throne, which the murderous conspirators had already assured to him, he was perfectly aware in his attempt to evade the issue. He was no longer next heir to the throne, although the undisputed head of the Karageorgevitch family of the former dynasty.

"Accept my son," he said. "I retain my letter in his favor."

He had hardly spoken these words when he saw that the commission was indeed the creature of the conspirators. Their pact had been made with Peter, but with George, the boy, not yet quite sixteen, and according y not yet of age under the Servian law. They had a firm grip on Peter, but none at all on George They declined the offer, and Peter had to go on and fulfill his contract with his fellow-conspirators

For twelve years, since the death of his wife, Peter the Pretender had lived quietly at Geneva, always expecting revolution, which has come to be the breath of life to the Servian people, and ready to make good his claim. His fatal step was to place in the hands of his fellow-conspirators some document which continues to bind him to them absolutely

It is folly to suppose that events of the past year have not completely disillusioned the whole Servian nation. For a time they were glad enough to have gotten rid of Draga, the former lady in waiting, whom they had always regarded as an intriguing adventuress, even with the disadvantage of loving Alexander, whom they had grown to like very well. In their ignorance of Peter's lacking but the match that is to ignite the part in the murder plot they tried hard to discover in him the qualities of an ideal ruler

These illusions fell away before the same spectacle that held aloof every European monarch—Colonel Maschin and all the other actual murderers retained in their high positions, the virtual rulers of Servia.

Fully three months ago the storm began to brew, and the clouds have grown blacker daily until now it is hard to see how Peter can possibly save himself. Nothing is and Alexander will not pass without bloodshed. The Vetchernt Novust grimly demands that "the experiment for the sake of which King Alexander was assassinated now cease." The Opinion compares Peter with a tramp who was never meant to stay in one place, and the Narodni Listy bodes worse the King that he can save his life only by flight

King Peter's talks is littered with documents which he dare not sign. Public business is retarded because he fears equally to take final action upon popular measures and upon those dictated to him by the conspirators. Only by postponement of these matters he is able to delay the breaking of the storm in one direction or the other

Further the people are accusing him of murder more heinous in their eyes than the killing of Draga, because the alleged victim of his power is one of themselves—Mlle Dechanska, the beautiful young actress who fascinated the Crown Prince, who was exiled from the kingdom and was later foully murdered.

The Woman in the Case.

From the beginning Peter has been consistent in one thing. He has seemed determined, whatever threatened himself, to secure the throne to his son. And he dreaded some entanglements of the young Crown Prince that would operate against h s popularity with is future subjects—that might be the means of his downfall, as Draga was the means of the downfa l of Alexander

This dread seemed justified when young George fell desperately in love with Mlle Dechanska. She was young, very beautiful in a refined way, and the popular favorite among the actresses of the Royal Theatre From the first moment that the Crown

[illegible] saw her in a tender and romantic [illegible] was under the spell of her attractions [illegible] entire heart and soul [illegible] passionate

In [illegible] Peter, however, strove to break off the affair. Just [illegible] George was, I was told pressed to be a soldier and [illegible] the [illegible] spent [illegible] of the [illegible] with [illegible] He [illegible] to [illegible] ng army. [illegible] ready to aid him in [illegible] affair of the court and they were able to [illegible] the [illegible] of the tutor to relax

One night the Prince, emboldened by the absence of [illegible] and [illegible] flowers over the footlights [illegible] a [illegible] showing his [illegible] and [illegible] leave in [illegible] of the royal box

It was no longer possible to conceal the affair from the king. He ordered all to [illegible] and the young woman was [illegible] escorted over the frontier and warned not to communicate in any way with the heir to the Servian throne.

In a very few days Prince George learned that Mlle. Dechanska was in Vienna. There were secret communications, and one evening the Prince stole quietly out of the palace and in a few hours had joined his actress-fiancee in a little hotel in the suburbs of the Austrian capital. There they made merry until the Austrian police, instructed to watch the actress, learned the identity of the boy who was paying her such devoted attention.

That very night M. Vasha Naudovitch, the King's crony and private secretary, appeared on the scene, kidnaped the Prince and carried him back to Belgrade.

Hope the King Will Flee.

Never again was the enamored boy to see his charmer. Mlle. Dechanska was forced to sign an agreement to break off all communication with him. She was procured with a handsome sum of money and advised to leave that part of Europe. She neglected to do so. It is said that she managed to get a letter into the prince's hands only a few days before her dead body was found in a lonely place under conditions which allowed that murder had been committed.

The prince's infatuation had become so notorious, and the King's efforts to separate the pair so generally known, that Peter is now boldly accused by his subjects of having compassed the girl's death.

As accustomed to revolutions and assassinations as the Servian people are, most of them dread a repetition of the scenes of the night of June 11 of last year. They live in the daily hope of hearing that King Peter has given himself safely out of the country. That would simplify matters very much But will the real rulers permit their puppet to escape? Where would they stand then? Would not they also have to flee for their lives, and thus lose their profitable occupations?

Draga and Alexander had decided upon flight, but Draga fatally postponed to act until her new $1,000 gown had arrived from Paris. The gown had hardly been taken from its wrappings when the assassins blew open the palace doors with dynamite to get at their prey

Will King Peter delay his flight upon one pretext or another until the anniversary of June 11 invites a tragic climax?

At the sound of the shattering palace doors Draga and Alexander fled upward by a secret stairway to a room, where they were safely concealed for two hours. It was one of the Queen's apartments, and in an adjoining room lay the Paris gown which had detained them in the conspirators' trap. When, finally, the King and Queen, after frantic efforts to defend themselves, were dispatched by the swords and pistols of the assassins and were thrown, dying, over a balcony upon the grass plot below, the Paris gown bore splashes of their blood

Giving the coup de grace to King Peter would be a simple matter If he is to be assassinated there are plenty of reasons why the act should be accomplished by the same hands that put away his predecessor This may prove to be their only salvation. They are all about the King and do not lack opportunities. This is what is expected, and the logical crisis is only eleven days distant.

A Liquid Rubber Glove to Preserve the Hands.

WOMEN who have labored with the of course, fits like the skin itself, and clumsy rubber gloves on the market doesn't interfere with movement or sense of to protect their hands from ammonia, washing fluids, photographic chemicals, and other skin spoilers, will be interested to know that a liquid glove has been devised and will soon be on the market which does away with all the faults of the present glove.

The idea consists of a solution of rubber of some kind, into which the hand is dipped and quickly removed The solution dries instantly, leaving a fine film of rubber coating the skin of the hand. This film, touch, and has no perceptible weight. However, it is claimed to be absolutely impervious to moisture.

When one is done with washing and desires to remove the glove, a second solution is provided which dissolves the film almost as quickly as it was formed

The invention was primarily intended for the use of surgeons, who are constantly crying out against the cumbrous rubber gloves, which interfere so seriously with that sense of feeling so essential to most operations.

SUNDAY AMERICAN-JOURNAL-EXAMINER PATTERNS

The Complete "Bargain Day" Patterns, Waist and Skirt, for Ten Cents, for This Charming Summer Gown, Which You Can Easily Make at Home for Yourself.

THE month of June is not alone the month of brides and roses, but the "merriest, maddest" month of all the year. It means the closing of schools for the long Summer holidays, the all-important commencements and the beginning of the general exodus from the city to seashore and mountains and countryside.

And with the joyful thoughts which June always brings come those of apparel and of what will be needed for visiting, for mountain climbing, seashore and all the rest. The list is a long one, ranging from traveling gowns and smart tailored suits to the simple but ever the less attractive shirt waist suits.

One gown which is sure to be needed is a thin frock for informal afternoon and evening wear. The dimity of organdie, lawn, mull and wash silks for this kind of frock are so beautiful each year that it will be a difficult matter to decide which one of them is going to prove most popular.

The design for the thin Summer frock illustrated herewith will appeal to every young woman who loves pretty clothes and who wants a really dainty gown for Summer wear.

The pattern is quite new and stylish, having just been made especially for the Sunday American-Journal-Examiner series of patterns. It can be developed most pleasingly in blue dimity with bands of insertion forming a part of the yoke, bolero, cuffs and collar. The boleros may be omitted and the blouse made in low pointed neck and elbow sleeves if desired.

The skirt consists of two seven-gored flounces shirred to yoke depth upon a five-gored foundation skirt. The double flounce skirt is a great favorite with those of slender proportions because of its simple grace.

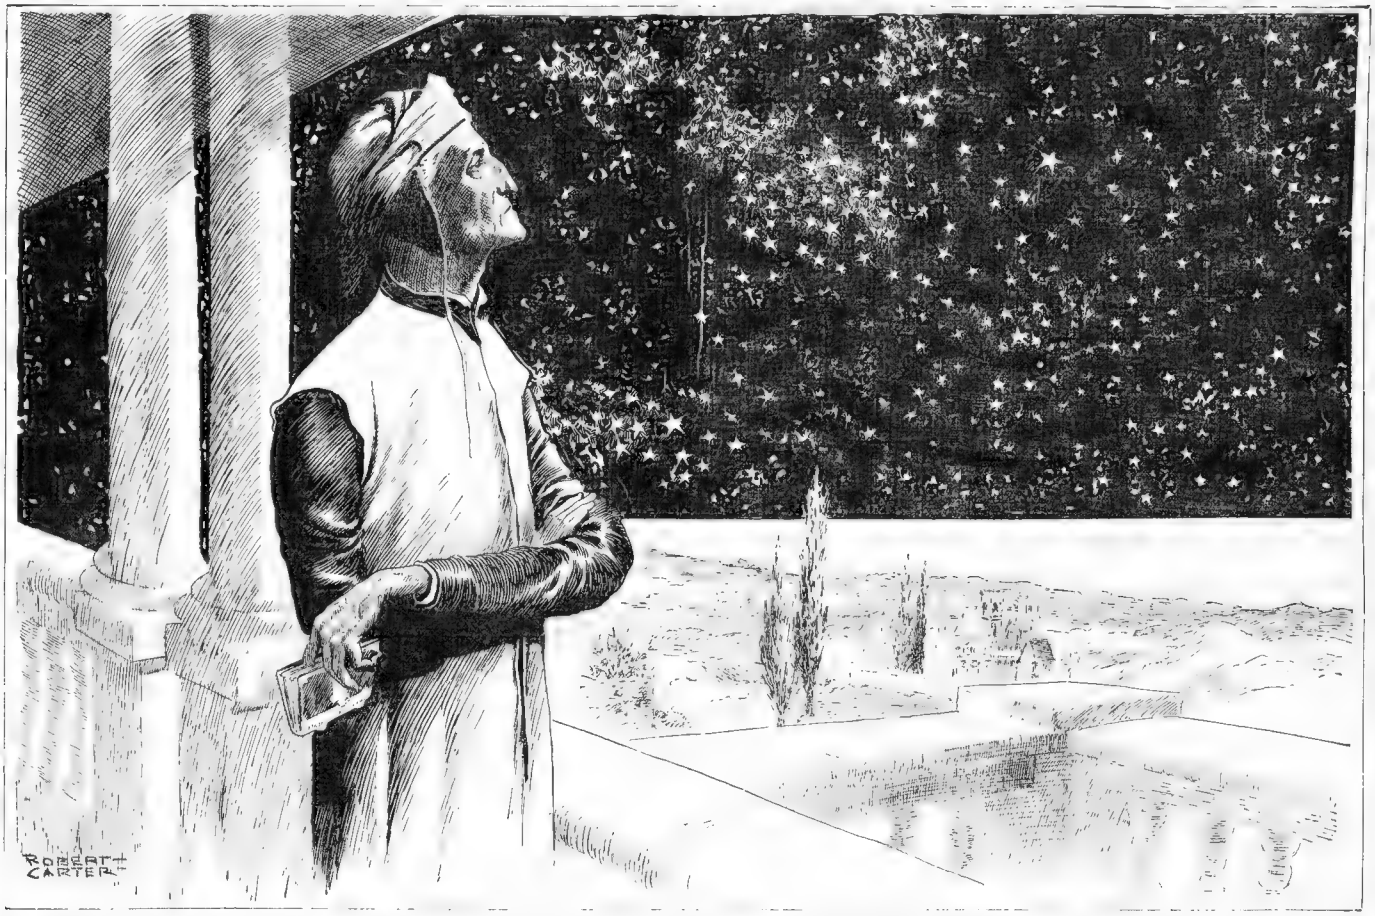
Did You Ever Study the Real World?



It is the world beyond this earth--the great world of the flying suns, the endless star-filled space, the true field of travel for the mind of man.

"AND they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."—Daniel xii., 3.

What is there in our lives that is really worth while? We come here for a moment and we go. We struggle to keep ourselves alive. The questions that agitate us, that we consider GREAT questions, are petty matter. How shall we be fed, when shall we cease oppressing one another, how can the rich man be forced to obey the law, or how can the law help to destroy poverty? These are the questions that men ask, as they open eyes here for a moment and close them again leaving the questions unanswered. We have struggled with these questions for thousands of years. We shall struggle with them for other centuries. And when at last we shall have solved them, new questions, material and small, will call for attention.

The minds of men MUST give their best energies to putting this world and its human society in order. We are the guardians of the little planet that we live on—and our first work is to settle our human housekeeping here. We MUST keep at the little problems upon which our little happiness depends.

But we can at the same time study the permanent, eternal universe in which our earth is a perishable speck. We can find comfort in our disappointments and inspiration in our work through contemplation of that illimitable creation which proves, in its harmony, beauty and grandeur, that Justice and Goodness rule infinite space.

[illegible] out from knowledge and sight of the world[illegible] and [illegible] tens around us. The rat or the insect that lives [illegible] in the cellar fills you with contempt. But the man who [illegible] contented on this little earth, without ever lifting [illegible] wonder and speculation at the regions beyond, is like the rat or insect, and worse—for he shuts out from his mind the one field of thought that might make it grow.

The beauty and power of the Old Testament come from contemplation of the stars. Had sacerdotal poetry been written by shepherds, inspired by their nights of watching on quiet hillsides long hours passed in contemplation of God's Infinite Power. And the study of the stars will inspire YOU, lend power to your imagination, and perhaps usefulness to your life among your fellows.

Our own finite studies, while necessary, are painful, barren, almost hopeless. Two of the greatest scientific names are those of Kelvin and Haeckel. Kelvin assures you that science proves the existence of God. Haeckel affirms that science proves that God does NOT exist.

Look out at night across the ocean of ether, study with a little understanding the lights that move in that far-off region, and you will not heed Haeckel's denial, or need Kelvin's [illegible]

How to Eliminate Hatred and Anger

[illegible] difficult as to put yourself out for one you pitied and helped up to the light. It cannot be done by retaliation and vindictive revenge. As Buddha said five hundred years before Christ, "Hate can only be killed by Love."

However you are maligned and misused by another, you are only lowering your own standard and lessening the sum of morality in the world by plotting vengeance. Defend yourself, of course, there is no real dignity in silently ignoring a falsehood, refute it, challenge the liar for proof. But after that let him go his way and run his race. Live the truth so absolutely in your thoughts, words and deeds that you need do no more than deny a statement to be believed. That is the best possible revenge to plan for your traducers. When you think of them say mentally: "I am sorry for you, you are sorry, too, and you are ashamed, and you will make reparation. Peace, and light, and understanding of God's Truth be yours."

Say these words every night before you sleep for those you believe are working evil for you or have wronged you.

PEACE BE UNTO YOU [illegible] it is the very highest wish we [illegible] anyone. To [illegible] absolutely [illegible] spirit, and a broad understanding of [illegible] ways and a large sympathy with [illegible] ity. So when you wish your enemies peace and light, you ask for what will make them your friends and their own saviors, if they open their hearts and receive.

It is, of course, ignorance [illegible] to have lies told about you. [illegible] beautiful hours of life to know [illegible] emies who try to make trouble for you. But far worse than knowing you have enemies is the consciousness that you are any man's enemy.

So long as you can look your own soul fearlessly in the eyes and say, "THERE IS NO BEING ON GOD'S EARTH I WISH ANYTHING BUT GOOD, there is no one I would not do a good turn if I had the opportunity," then you have nothing to fear [illegible]

It is a greater achievement to control one's feelings than to [illegible] keep your enemy down [illegible] your friend.

The moment you are [illegible] to your enemy you become your own worst foe. The moment you become a friend to your enemy he is disarmed, and you have [illegible] armor which renders you invulnerable.

When you have absolute [illegible] you will [illegible] that is indestructible. Your capacity will augment as your [illegible] ishes. In the midst [illegible] disorders you will [illegible] heaven of pity and love to revenge your self by their own methods.

And that will be the most severe revenge [illegible]

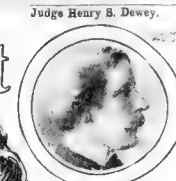
Who'll be the next Rich Man to Marry a Boston Shop Girl?

Miss Anna Sullivan.



Judge Henry S. Dewey.

Butler Ames.

S. Huntington Wolcott.

Grafton Cushing.

Above are given some types of the rich Boston bachelors. So far as is known, none of them as yet has been pierced by Cupid's dart.

Sly Little Cupid Seems to Be Lying in Wait in Boston's Big Stores for the Unwary but Rich Young Bachelors—Some Romances of the Past in Exclusive Society Circles.

"Who will be the next?" asks one of the rich young girls who ruled Boston society in days not long gone by, as she reads over the long list of engagements and marriages recorded in the newspapers.

The question is one that is being asked by hundreds of young women, and pretty shopgirls as well as society belles are included in the list of those who are anxiously waiting for the little god to shoot his arrow into the heart of some rich young man.

The interest aroused between the sons of wealthy families and a pretty shopgirl, like that of young Richard Heckscher of Philadelphia, Harvard freshman, and Miss Anna Egan, clerking at one of the department stores, in the announcement of the marriage of William F. Clapp to Helen Gertrude Bates, has caused much consternation in the most exclusive aristocratic and especially society circles of the town.

For several years now a well known Back Bay woman has had it down as a settled fact that Boston's most eligible young bachelor would some day marry a pretty shopgirl, and she has been anxiously waiting for the time when the lucky girl should be announced. Another well known society woman has picked out a number of girls whom she considers pretty enough to win the heart of any man, and has asked them to lunch, has come and taken a chance on meeting the fortune of a lifetime.

It seems to have been a regular fad in Boston for rich young men to marry pretty shopgirls. Almost every large dry goods shop in town, and the counters crowded with beautiful girls, were visited by the scouts of pretty girls who were looking for husbands. Many of the girls selected were invited to attend some fashionable function, and were compelled to keep their engagements with the men who had the inside track. Some of the latter had asked them to lunch, had asked to look at their rings, had asked them to have no engagement individual.

Those unequal marriages, as they are termed, have a long history, but it would seem that frequent experience has not in any great degree lessened the desire which so many girls whenever a man is found between wealth and position and poverty and position to make him "Why will he do it?"

"Who will be next?" was a topic of the hour on the floor of the place.

What the Girls Say.

"There will be no opportunity for most young women to meet the rich young men of Boston," said one of the girls who are employed in the department stores. "Unless we are introduced to the men of fortune and family there are other businesses where I wouldn't be ashamed of an engagement we'll soon announced. Any why not? Does engaging in a shop make one position a girl can not engage as well as another?"

Many shopgirls are undeniably attractive.

"Are not the beauties found here equal to those exaggerated by the society novels in some cities? Are they ever dressed? Again, young people with a moderate income and thousands of young men, which would be more welcome? In asking to have them serve boys."

There are pretty hearts whose owners are girls, in the main well bred and decidedly attractive.

"Where are your pretty women?" a stranger has often asked of the native Bostonian. "I've seen so few on the streets. In New York every woman you meet is a beauty, or so it seems."

Where are the dry goods shops and offices and stores to see them? The fashion response, when the streets are filled with pretty girls the Boston business woman is usually a very attractive individual.

Those unequal marriages, as they are termed, have a long history, but it would seem that frequent experience has not in any great degree lessened the desire which so many girls whenever a man is found between wealth and position and poverty and position to make him "Why will he do it?"

"Who will be next?" was a topic of the hour on the floor of the place.

Marriages Are Happy.

As a matter of statistics it would seem that marriages have not been unhappy as compared with the number contracted in the usual course of society events and in the few instances it is said by those who know that family opposition has caused a wreck of discipline.

It was said by those that Harrison Gray Otis' late granddaughter, Miss Lucy Otis, eloped with a stable boy, whose family kept a livery and whose boys was in the stable. But it is denied by the shop. Rathbone Gray Otis' cousin and so many cousins that it is almost impossible to find them.

Before the Union was formed there was a Harrison Gray Otis who was treasurer of the colony.

Another Harrison Gray Otis, grandfather of the present head of the family, was Mayor of Boston.

Mr. Otis's brother was Secretary of State. He was opposed to his daughter's marriage with fancy young man. He had a very objectionable son-in-law. He died before he had left the country. He would have been glad to have a daughter-in-law who would have been a good wife. Mrs. Otis was a Miss Lee.

Boston's most popular hostess was Mrs. Louise Lee Curtis, whose husband was a Harrison Gray Otis. Mrs. Otis was a Miss Lee. Mrs. Curtis was the daughter of Mrs. Otis

"CENSOR" AT WELLESLEY?

IF Wellesley colleges possessed a censor, that censor is a nice, amiable, broadminded sort of individual, who is not liable enough to know that even if undergraduate girls possessed of histrionic aspirations she must have some means of support, and that this support might just as well be usable as hidden by smudges and cross lines and blots.

Also, if Wellesley has such a censor, they Vassar is wild with envy.

What Vassar thespians stand on is not known to the outside world.

The Vassar censor "blurs actors at the knee" and then, and then only, permits their likenesses to appear in public.

How different at Wellesley!

The Wellesley juniors gave that delightful play of Sol Smith Russell's "A Bachelor's Romance."

The masculine roles were filled by pretty girls in the most fetching and up-to-date of mannish attire. Bosoms were covered their pompadoured necks.

Well tailored coats encased their svelte figures.

And then jaunty knickerbockers and the finest of silken hosiery and the daintiest of footwear did the rest.

More than that, the photographs prove it.

No blurs at the knees for the Wellesley girls!

Good, sensible censor!

Vassar Girls Were Pained.

At Vassar the girls gave "The Little Minister."

They, too, were proper girls, but only the privileged few of their classmates who were allowed to witness the play knew exactly how they looked in masculine attire.

Proudly they had their pictures taken. Patronize they posed.

Then the censor got busy. His smudge scratch obliterated all the pictures appeared on the pages of Vassar's censor what in the way of nudity they or knees now used to some their babies were left entirely to the imagination.

What wonder that there was wailing and gnashing of teeth among the blurred ones?

To be robbed unceremoniously and without consultation of knees, ankles feet—well, wouldn't it make anyone a little disgruntled, no matter how natural to sensible one might be? But the Vassar girls—

You see, the censor, he was a watch and it made it clear to the "Ballade of the Half Blurred Pictures," with a general sense of the class which had been partially blotted out of sight.

At Wellesley there has been no such blurring to-day.

When the clever and most popular girl in the junior class, Miss Emilie Callaway, played the part of David Holmes in "A Bachelor's Romance" she played it precisely as a girl would attire. Sol Smith Russell Miss Helen Edwards and Miss Esther Schwarz Holmes were garments of similar style.

Boys Were Just Too "Sweet."

The other girls declared "the boys were just too sweet," and that Miss Callaway was simply irresistible.

If there is a censor at Wellesley he or she was sleeping.

Not an hour to censure the knees of Wellesley girls.

Just three more tee junior Barn could show.

The Boston Globe comments favorably on the play, and says: "Miss Emilie Callaway, '06, gave the part of David Holmes, the student. Miss Callaway wrote the play last year and took the part, assuming it with the confidence and ease of a professional actress. In appearing as she did as David Holmes, a young man of the Bachelor's class, Miss Callaway was seen to great advantage. Her support was excellent. Miss Marion Epsworth, Miss Ethel Hall, Miss Ray Tyler, Miss Helen Schoenhorn and Laura Arnold were the other 'boys' in the Bachelor's class.

And they enjoyed photographing an undressed.

WILL MEET TO TALK PEACE

Russian and Japanese Representatives Will Come Together at Washington.

BARON ROSEN WILL REPRESENT THE CZAR

Japan Will Entrust Cause to Its Ambassador, Mr. Takahira.

INDEMNITY ALL THAT RUSSIA BALKS AT

This Point Also May Be Yielded if Absolutely Insisted Upon.

St. Petersburg, June 11.—Representatives from Japan and Russia will meet in Washington to discuss terms of peace.

This fact is certain. The Russian representative will be Baron Von Rosen. The Japanese representative will probably be the present Japanese minister to the United States, Mr. Takahira, although there is still a chance that the Russian government may ask that Japan name some one of Von Rosen's rank.

That is all that is admitted at the Russian capital up to the present time. It is all that is likely to be admitted until the plenipotentiaries actually meet. It is understood that the Japanese terms of peace, as already unofficially communicated, are in every way acceptable with the exception of the indemnity plan and that will eventually be conceded should it be absolutely insisted on by Japan, but the Russian representative will oppose it to the last.

It is considered likely that should Japan continue to insist that the Manchurian railway be turned over to her, she cannot refuse to reimburse the Russian capitalists who have put up money for the development of the system.

The Russian government feels that a frank interchange of views between men having the best interests of the two countries at heart will be likely to result in mutual concessions that will eventually end in the adoption of a hard and fast treaty between Russia and Japan.

REPLIES ACCEPT THE PRESIDENT'S PEACE PROPOSITION

Washington, June 10.—Following an exchange of telegrams between President Roosevelt and Emperor Nicholas, which was received by the Russian Imperial Foreign Office at St. Petersburg and Minister Grisscom at Tokio, on behalf of the governments to which they are accredited.

Exactly what form the measures taken will not be known until Secretary Taft returns to Washington, probably about eight when the President will return from his two days outing on Oyster Bay. They will then be made public.

If these reports be true President Roosevelt peace proposal has been accepted in form as it is believed that any material modification to crush of the belligerents that the other has accepted is unthinkable. The next step will be transmitted to each of the respective governments.

Will Suspend Hostilities.

This accomplished Tokio and St. Petersburg will notify their commanding generals in the field to suspend hostilities pending peace negotiations.

During these negotiations the troops in the trenches along two blocks of Broadway from Rockaway avenue to Chauncey street

OFFICE GRABBERS WILL GET NO AID FROM ME, SAYS COL. POPE

"PUBLIC DUTY BEFORE PARTY DUTY, I SAY"
"THERE ARE TOO MANY PROFESSIONAL POLITICIANS"
"I HAVE FOUND THAT HONESTY PAYS"
"IF, BY ANY CHANCE I SHOULD EVER BECOME GOVERNOR—"

Sketched by Staff Artist Carll of the Boston Sunday American.

Colonel Albert A. Pope, Who in an Interview With the BOSTON SUNDAY AMERICAN, Says He Is Willing to Accept the Democratic Nomination for Governor and That He Believes Honest Business Men Are Needed in Public Offices.

READY TO RUN FOR GOVERNOR IF HIS PARTY WISHES.

Does Not Seek the Office, but Is Willing to Accept Nomination if the Acceptance is for the Benefit of the People.

go because I was anxious for glory. I did not go to step ladder. I simply felt it to be my duty to go.

"The one purpose that actuated me then would govern me in regard to the call to civil duty. I do not aspire to office. I have no ambition in politics. I want no extra work, but if called would view the case from the duty standpoint.

"If I should ever be a candidate for the office of Governor, be assured that the office desires me, not I it. I would say to the people:

"Don't vote for me from party feeling. If the other man is better fitted for the duty, elect him."

"The people elected Douglas with reference to that fact. I am a Democrat myself, and should vote for him. He has been a good governor.

"The best man for the place, regardless of party, should be elected. I am a good party man, but not a blind partisan. I refuse to accept the platform of any political party, unless it is for the best interests of the public weal.

"Party principles are all right as guides to public welfare.

No Use for Office-Seekers.

"The trouble is there are too many professional politicians in one party. Therefore it behooves the party managers to be careful not to give the nomination for Governor to the selfishly ambitious.

"If I by any chance should ever be Governor, the self-seeking, office-seeking politicians would get absolutely no preferment from me. I know they have bothered Governor Douglas.

"If they should seek the office from me it would disgust me and I would say so. If they should ever come to me and say, 'We elected you, we put you in, you would retort:

"Why did you do it? You have simply put a lot of extra work on a man who has worked hard all his life. You did me no favor if you put me here to attempt to secure from me public favors. My idea of the duty of the Governor is at variance with yours.'

As the colonel paused to shift the troublesome leg, I inquired:

"What kind of a man should you say ought to be nominated by the Democrats of Massachusetts?"

Business Men Needed.

By that time the colonel was quite well in his big chair. His pain was without hesitation and with emphasis:

"A business man! The business men are the smartest in America today. They know what makes prosperity. They see what the needs of the country are. When Speaker Cannon of the House of Representatives of the country did not know what the wants of the people were, and said so, the people turned him down. Did you notice that?

"What are some of the things wanted by the people?

"A fairer tariff and more equitable distribution of the burdens of taxation. We need to consider our manufacturers more than other countries. We want a tariff that will help the people and help them to hold their own with other countries. We need a tariff that will help the people, not help to enlarge the fortunes of the few. I do not think of it now as I did when I was a boy. I was a protectionist then, but I am not the same man I was then.

High Tariff Made Carnegie.

"How was it possible for Carnegie to make $350,000,000 in a generation?" was the question colonel Pope put to me. I answered as I had used to answer, I confess, and said:

"Just because of the tariff. The people were taxed so much that they could not buy. The mills could not run. Then the tariff was changed and the mills started up. Carnegie was a protectionist. He was a big man. I could not blame him for taking advantage of the tariff. He was not to blame for the people's folly."

"We need more honest business men in politics. We need men whose public service is the outgrowth of the conception of duty and the sense of obligation beneath the duty purpose of giving good public service. We need more of the Governor Douglas type.

"Be Honest and Work."

"The only rule of business that works well all the time is honesty and endeavor. By all I mean and reason that is said by the rule of public service. I have heard Governor Douglas say what I said and I owe all of my success to that thing.

"Be honest and work, whether in private business or public service. The dishonest always come to grief; the fellow that shirks or fails to put steam in the background, he is not in sight at the finish of the race.

"As I said, I am not a candidate for the nomination for Governor. I don't seek the place, but if I were I should be Governor—and to be Governor in my State is the highest honor I could hope for—it would be my rule to be honest and work. To be Governor of one's own State should be appreciation, is a mark of confidence from fellow-men that any man should most highly appreciate.

Still, hating me not, I ventured to ask the colonel if he thought Governor Douglas was the best known business man in the state, not excepting that splendid man, Marshall Field, of Chicago.

Led Good Roads Movement.

"Over thirty years ago I went into the bicycle business in a small way and I

Is the Ideal Host.

Colonel Pope is an interesting type of man. He is full all the time and quite silent. Although his hair is gray and his whiskers also, there oddly does not seem to be any gray hair in the face. His eyes are bright and his voice is soft and pleasing. He is the ideal host and put the interviewer at his greeting reveals the fact that there is much of good fellowship beneath the austere appearance of the man.

SNAPSHOTS AT POLITICS

BY COL ALBERT A. POPE,

Who May Be Nominated for Governor

There are too many professional politicians in our party.

The self seeking, office hunting politicians would get absolutely no preferment from me. I know how they have bothered Gov. Douglas.

No honest man believes in a tariff that fosters monopolies and high prices.

THE 'BOSS' NOW PLANS HIS VACATION.

The Man Who Runs Things—Political, Business, Professional—Prepares to Enjoy a Very Brief Summer Respite.

GOV. DOUGLAS WANTS SECLUSION FOR A TIME.

Mayor Collins Will Stay at Home—Lawson May Write Some More—Pidgin Is Busy with Census—Camp for Cole

The Boston "boss" is preparing for his vacation trip.

When, where and how is the "boss" going to do it?

Mark Twain called his "Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court" by the title of "The Boss," to show he ran things generally.

So let's use the same word of the men who run Boston. This means not only the political "boss," but the literary "boss," the society "boss," the business "boss" and the legal "boss."

These men who are "Who's Who" in Boston have their vacations. At least they mean to.

Contractor Harry Nawn, for instance, won't have much of a one this year for he's taken a shovel and hoe down under the cobblestones and is digging a subway as fast as he can. And he hasn't got time for a rest this Summer. His vacation will be spent "underneath Washington street."

Charles Jerome Pidgin, who writes books and, Dodge fix it, and who is head of the State Bureau of Statistics of Labor, is taking a rocker's rest now for the State. He only lets it rock in July, August and September, when those people in "society" going on a short vacation or figure.

Two Vacations for Gov. Douglas.

If Mr. Pidgin is busy he's going to stand away in August and go to Sea Front where he'll take a vacation of taking statistics on Summer girls.

There's another Douglas on the board of the State, you might like to know. Yes, it's the Governor. He's going to take a vacation.

He's going to sail away to some place where no reporters come from trouping and pull out the anchor. And he won't tell where that place is, you bet.

Then he'll come back to Boston again and go to Marmont Beach where he and Mrs. Douglas nearly own a cottage for the hot weather.

Mayor Will Stay in Town.

President Eliot here does not go to Harvard, will pass the days of his usual at North end Harbor, Me., his summer house. It is understood that he will sail his boat and do a little rowing, just to keep in his usual trim.

Mayor Collins, the mayoral boss, will be in town all Summer for Soldiers' Relief. In addition His Honor will indulge as much as possible in the constitutional walks which are such a characteristic of his.

Lucius Tuttle, "Boss of the Boston & Maine," will summer in his home at Bar Harbor, Me.

Thomas W. Lawson isn't going to be "boss" from choice. But the Republican choice sending a little boodle at the last minute brought Mr. Law son's name.

Is Mr. Lawson going away this Summer?

Well, nothing definite planned yet. What's the use, with saying he will enjoy a full Dreamland.

"Must be cold comfort to myself," he said, "with saying Frenzied Finance, and all good readers."

Dr. Maurice L. Richardson, who is boss of the operating room, will go to Manchester, where he has a country house.

Lomasney Not Going Abroad.

City Treasurer George H. Crocker will also pass the week ends at Marion, where he drives an auto for good vacation sport.

J. Reed Whipple, the hotel boss, will rather plaintively greet the phone, "Expect to be here all Summer."

Four distinguished It members will be on already are slightly seeing in Europe. They are Ex-Judge Henry S. Dewey, R. P. Ketchum, the Rev. E. Winchester Donald, D. D., of Trinity Church and the Rev. William H. Lamson, one of the Church Advocate staff.

Martin M. Lomasney, the "Czar of Ward 8," took a vacation in the early part of June. And he hasn't taken one since and no one ventures to say he ever will.

Sidney Jay Donovan will be in town, he says, all Summer.

General Bancroft, boss of the Ancients, will get away to his country place, Shirley Heights, Scituate, as often as he can.

Adjutant-General Nelson A. Miles is going to be in town for the most part of the State months at Westfield, Mass., and Old Point Comfort, Va.

He would like to go to Europe later in the season, and may do so, but he has no definite plans.

Judge Considerable Dodge, boss of the Municipal Court, will spend most of the Summer at his home in Jordan Hill, dispensing Scotch hospitality at his new cottage, Inverness Castle, Scotland.

Lynn, June 10.—News was given out by the police to-day of five more cases of breaking and entering which had just been reported to them, making nine cases which have occurred in the past three days. PIANO

SELLING

We are frank to confess that one of the impelling reasons that induced us to add pianos to our many lines was the splendid opportunity to mark down prices to a point heretofore unknown in selling good pianos. The average piano business means a sale at long intervals, and the profits had to be big enough to keep the store doors open between times.

In selling pianos every day, the cost of handling is divided over many sales instead of few. Lower prices—very much lower prices than piano buyers ever knew before—are bringing the business.

And we sell only high-class, guaranteed instruments. Every one has a reputation and standard of quality that puts it in the first rank. Note the names:

The Decker & Son — The Stodart
The James & Holmstrom — The Rudolf
The Jacob Doll — The Frederick

Not a better gathering of good instruments in any store in New England.

You may pay cash or take advantage of our deferred payment plan; a small amount down, the balance at your convenience, and only a modest interest charge of 4% on the unpaid balance, which becomes smaller as your payments are made. We have sold dozens of pianos on this plan. We will take your old instrument at a fair valuation

Come in and spend half an hour in the piano parlors. Test the instruments, and bring your musical friends who know piano value.

Message of Gratitude to the Head of Christian Science from Executive Members of the First Church of Boston

ANNUAL SESSION IS BEING HELD HERE

Yearly Business Meeting of the Church Will Be Held Tuesday, Time and Place to Be Announced To-day

"Gratitude," was the keynote of a message sent to the Rev. Mary Baker G. Eddy, at Concord, N. H., by the executive members of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, which held their annual meeting yesterday in the famous "Mother Church" at the corner of Falmouth and Norway streets.

This session of the executive members of the "Mother Church" was preliminary to the annual communion, which comes today, and to the annual business meeting which will take place Tuesday.

The message to Mrs. Eddy was as follows:

Beloved Leader and Teacher:

We, [illegible] in annual meeting with [illegible] of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, [illegible] express our gratitude for the [illegible] and [illegible] share with you the good [illegible] of the [illegible] year's work. EVERETT HIGH RAN AWAY FROM THE WALTHAM BOYS

Everett, June 10. Everett High defeated Waltham High in a one-sided game at Everett today. The home team had the game won in the second inning when four runs were scored. Waltham had no show from the first.

Coffin was in the box for Everett, and gave but seven hits. The feature of the game was a one-handed catch in centre-field by Mitchell.

By winning this game Everett has a fair chance of winning in the Eastern Massachusetts League. Waltham still has first place, but should she be defeated by Wellesley next week Everett will be her rival for first place. The score:

CHAMPS MAKE EVERY HIT COUNT AND DEFEAT CLEVELAND, 9 TO 3

Uncle Cy Young Pitches One of His Grand Games—Lajoie's Men Start Off Well, but Bostons Soon Put the Game on Ice—Off Day for Parent.

BY A. H. C. MITCHELL.

It wasn't much of a game from a scientific standpoint, but the Champs won it, 9 to 3, so what do we care for the fine points.

The Clevelands started off as though they meant business, but once the Bostons got a-going the visitors never had a look in. The Champs only got in seven safe hits, but every one, except that of Criger counted in the run-getting. Ferris, who was batted every time he went to bat, scored the first two runs with a sizzling triple to centre in the second and before the inning was over Selbach drove another three-base hit into the right-field crowd.

Hess had passed the first two men to first and it was thought the scoring that followed would send him to the bench, but Manager Lajoie made the tall fellow stick it out and he had a rather trying time of it.

Uncle Cy Right On Edge.

Uncle Cy Young got one of his finest games, only five scratches being registered against him. Of these only two were of the clean variety of hits, one in the third and Lajoie's single in the seventh. He has developed a peach of a curve ball, and it's a beauty when it's working.

The great leader of the Cleveland forces was defeated by the Boston Leaguers for the first time after he had defied him for two years. Previous to that time Lajoie had failed to connect safely with Young's delivery in this year.

The Hub Parent ... [illegible] ... Parent grabbed Lajoie's ... [illegible] ... to pass him, ... [illegible] ... Your scribe ... [illegible] ... and every [illegible] ... run.

Parent Redeems Himself.

On the other hand he figured in a fine double play and caught a liner from the bat of Bay in the seventh that was a dandy. The last two batsmen of the day fired the ball [illegible] ... down ... BOSTON NATIONALS LOSE FOURTH GAME TO SELEE'S CHICAGOS

Tenney's Men Are Not Able to Give the Microbes a Run for Their Money—Score 7 to 0.

Special to the Sunday American.

Chicago, June 10.—Three consecutive defeats, but a row of little ciphers to mark the work of the Boston Nationals today. There were nine of them, and the Microbes had a monopoly on the same kind of marks—not exactly the same, for they were five-ling ciphers, while the others chronicled a blank.

The first inning was the only one that painted brush up to the standard of previous exhibitions, and he showed that much was like this: "2." Then a happy lot of fans, who will not have finished talking about the game Wicker pitched by to-morrow's dinner time, wended their way home.

Four Straight for Chicago.

The shutout of Boston by the Microbes in the final game made four straight victories for Selee's bunch.

Boston, dispirited by the loss of three games before to-day's, was not able to give the Microbes even a hard rub. The four games played with a beaten air from the first. Willetts pitched a good game, but the support he got was not calculated to lend a good slip to the ball.

Either the Microbes were not up to their usual on their feet to-day, or Willetts failed to get action that would have been, for everybody to-day is easy to bunt out an infield hit.

There were [illegible] Hosting to keep White's [illegible] pit her to the [illegible] was hurt [illegible] to work and Sugden [illegible] blind the bat.

Fast on the Bases.

BOSTON Y. M. C. A. ATHLETES WIN THE ANNUAL MEET.

Make a Clever Showing at Wood Island Park—Newton Is a Good Second—Chelsea Boys Are Well Satisfied

The third annual championship meeting of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Massachusetts and the Boston Y. M. C. A. League was held at Wood Island Park, East Boston, yesterday afternoon. The meet was held under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Sports Committee and was contested by ten Y. M. C. A. associations. There were ten events and nine records were broken in the meeting.

The Y. M. C. A. of Boston, New Bedford, Brockton, Lynn, Malden, Winchester, Arlington and Melrose competed, also one of the Rhode Island associations making entries.

Medals for Winners.

Gold, silver and bronze medals were awarded to the first second and third winners respectively in each event, and each association entered as a body for points. Five points for first winner, three for second and one for third.

The Boston Y. M. C. A. secured position above the associations with a score of 41 points, five points ahead of Newton, which was second place with 36 points. Chelsea was third with 31 points, Malden and Lynn tied for fourth place with 30 points each, Brockton fifth with 19 points, Arlington sixth with 14 points and Winchester seventh with 12 points. New Bedford and Melrose tied for last place with 10 points each.

Interesting Dash.

The 100-yard dash was the first event that created extra dollar interest. There were five heats and two men qualified in each heat, and the two winners were to run off for first place. Williams of Boston Y. M. C. A. won the first heat, Mahoney of Lynn the second, Hall of Boston Y. M. C. A. the third, Hall of Boston Y. M. C. A. the fourth and Hall of Boston Y. M. C. A. the fifth. Williams of Boston Y. M. C. A. won the final heat, Mahoney of Lynn second, Hall of Boston Y. M. C. A. third, Hall of Boston Y. M. C. A. fourth and Hall of Boston Y. M. C. A. fifth.

"I SEE NO HOPE FOR MARY ROGERS," SAYS GOV. BELL

To Women of New England, Especially the Wives and the Mothers of Vermont.

Do you think Mary Rogers should be publicly hanged for a crime committed when she was about to become a mother?
Do you realize that her condition was not made known to the jury which found her guilty, and that the man on whose testimony she was convicted has see confessed that he committed perjury to save himself?
Do you believe that the honor and dignity of the State of Vermont would be sufficiently upheld if her sentence were commuted to life imprisonment?
Do you wish to aid in bringing about this result?
Then write or telegraph to Governor Charles J. Bell, East Hardwick, Vt., and ask him to grant a reprieve to Mary Rogers, so that she shall not be hanged ut the Legislature shall have had a chance to consider the facts in this case which have not previously been brought to their attention.
The Governor thinks the people of Vermont WANT Mrs Rogers hanged.
Is it true that the citizens of Vermont desire to take this woman's life?
Unless you convince Governor Bell to the contrary, Mrs. Rogers will in all probability be publicly, officially AND BARBAROUSLY killed on June 23.

Vermont Executive Declares Law Must Take Its Course in Case of Woman Doomed to Die.

save her," I exclaimed, "and she makes no plea to you. Doesn't she ask you to try to save her life? Doesn't she beg you to help her?"

SENT VERSES SHE HAD WRITTEN IN A LETTER TO GOVERNOR.

"Well, she knows I am the Governor," he replied, "but she never made any plea to me. She has never begged me to help her.

"Do you know," he said, suddenly, "that Mrs. Rogers has a remarkable way of handling words for a woman of no education? She speaks well and fluently. It is unusual, her command of language, when you consider her lack of schooling.

"She is a naturally bright woman. Her letters to me are very well written."

The last letter which Governor Bell has received from Mrs. Rogers was written just after the knowledge of the reprieve reached her. With it she sent a few verses of poetry which she had written, expressing still in a calm way, gratitude for the few days more of life which had been granted her.

But there was no heart-broken plea for mercy, no wild begging for life, even for a life in prison.

I walked along through the mellow sunshine with the Governor as far as Montgomery's grocery store, where he had some shopping to do.

"Are you going to be home this week?" I asked. "I want to know where to find you."

"My plans are uncertain," he said laughing, "but I will say this: I'll be home in a very few minutes if you will stop trying to interview me."

It was too broad a point to be ignored, and, besides, when Governor Bell says he won't talk, he won't, and that's all there is to it.

"Good-by," I said, holding out my hand, "please give me a little ray of hope for Mrs. Rogers."

"I can't see that there is any hope for her," he replied as he entered the store.

"LEGISLATURE NOW FOR MRS. ROGERS"

Windsor, Vt., June 10.—One of the most influential members of the Vermont Legislature, a man who is thoroughly familiar with the Mary Rogers case, declares this afternoon that if the State Legislature were to pass again upon the life or death of Mrs. Rogers, it would be strongly in her favor. This, he says, is due to a change in sentiment since the vote last Winter.

Benjamine S. N. Taylor of Windsor is the man who has taken this attitude. He is anxious to further any plan that may save Mrs Rogers from the gallows. The plan to petition Governor Bell to reprieve Mrs. Rogers again until another Legislature shall have opportunity to act meets with Mr. Taylor's fullest approval. Mr. Taylor said to a reporter for the BOSTON AMERICAN to-day:

"If the Legislature of Vermont were to pass again upon whether Mrs. Rogers were to live or die, and take the vote to-day, I believe it would be strong for life. Sentiment in the Legislature has changed since the vote last Winter.

"I voted for a commutation of sentence. I should vote so again in her case and any case, because I don't believe in the State killing anyone. There were less than a hundred of us on that side, and the rest of the House was for allowing the law to take its course. But there was nothing before the Legislature at that time as an argument in favor of commutation except the simple argument that as long as every other murderer for 100 years had been commuted this woman should be, also with the additional argument that she was a woman. Legislators said:

"If a woman could commit a crime as bad as a man a woman should hang for it. It is time the State stopped executing sentences, as long as there is a hanging law on the statute book.

"At that time the legislators had not heard anything about Perham's confession that he testified as he did at the trial to save his own neck, and they did not know anything about the evidence of Dr. McWayne of Hoosick Falls, that Mrs. Rogers was insane two days before the murder. I believe, and I know a lot are with me, members believe, that the Legislature should have a chance to pass upon these facts before this woman hangs. Many who voted against her before would give her the benefit of the doubt to-day. I am sure. If the Legislature were in session to-day I am positive Mrs. Rogers would not be hanged a week from next Friday. If Governor Bell would reprieve her until the next session, I firmly believe she would have her sentence commuted by a two-third vote. If there is a petition to him from the Legislature's members, asking him to reprieve her, I will be glad to sign it. The trouble is it would be very hard and very expensive to reach all the members, all over the State, with such a paper in the time that is left."

MRS. ROGERS NOT YET TOLD OF DOOM

By J. Frank Davis.

Windsor, Vt., June 10.—They have not had the heart, yet, to tell Mary Rogers that her last legal hope is gone, and that the only chance she has for life lies in the mercy of a Governor who has said he will show none. She feels sure, now, that she will be saved that awful journey to the scaffold. She said it to Rev. W. H. Hayes, the prison chaplain, but yesterday.

"I feel sure it is coming out all right" she told him in the course of a fifteen-minute talk he had with her in her ward on the third floor of the administration building of the State prison. "They have reprieved me twice, and I feel sure they are going to do it again."

She knows little of the ins and out of the legal proceedings. Stays of execution, new trial proceedings, writs of error—all these are "reprieves" to her.

Mrs. Rogers was silent a minute, looking out of the window across the hills to the green mountain country. She sighed. Then she added, "but if they don't—it will be all right just the same."

"Hopeful, resigned and brave," is the way Chaplain Hayes puts his description of her.

Comforted by Matron.

Superintendent Lovell was at Woodstock, the seat of this county, yesterday, with Sheriff Peck. The news that the Federal Court had refused the last plea of the condemned woman's attorneys reached them together. Sheriff Peck said he should come to Windsor to-day. Superintendent Lovell awaited his arrival before informing Mrs. Rogers of the result of the court proceedings. Official business delayed the Sheriff in White River Junction, and he could not come. The Superintendent did not tell her.

Miss Durkee, who for twenty years has watched over the women of the prison as matron, knows Mary Rogers better than any other living person. She has talked with her by the hour. She has comforted her, given her words of hope, and gently, when necessary, broken the tidings of despair. Miss Durkee was unwilling today to tell her that the time had again come to prepare her mind for death, that time without any reasonable hope of respite. So Mary Rogers, sitting in her window, worked blithely at her sewing all this afternoon, her heart full of hope, ignorant of the fateful tidings the sheriff must himself bring to-morrow or Monday.

"I have never believed until to-day that she would be hanged," said Superintendent Lovell to me this afternoon. "To-day it seems to me there is no hope. I guess the execution is sure to take place."

Gallows Stands Ready.

There will be few preparations to make this time. The gallows, gaunt and black, stands in the corridor of the west wing, where it was erected ten days ago. The walk is short from the woman's cell to the flight of steps that will lead to eternity. Every official assigned to his position before the reprieve is ready for his gruesome duty on the 23rd. "We shall not put her in the death cell," said Superintendent Lovell. "She is more comfortable and happier where she is. There is no need to make it any harder for her by removing her to the cell where she waited for the execution last February.

"Mrs. Rogers is in good health. The prison discipline, which for nearly two years has taken the place of the sordid, unnatural life that she once led, has made her naturally strong physically. She is unable to endure any one. She weighs 170 pounds. But for the deadly prison pallor she would be colored with glow of perfect health, for even with her lack of exercise she has more color in her cheeks than in those of most of her fellow prisoners.

Sure She Will Be Brave.

Her severe attack of nervousness, which preceded the last previous date set for her execution, has entirely passed away, and its principal symptom, the inability to eat her food, was gone as soon as her mind was relieved. The officials believe that her nervous condition at that time was due to the anxiety of her lawyers over her fate than to the fact that she stood in danger of early death. They think she will not have a recurrence of such extreme nervousness when her fate is definitely settled, and she knows she has no hope.

"I would give a great deal to witness the execution, which I do as a matter of my duty," said Chaplain Hayes this afternoon. "Yet I feel fully convinced that Mrs. Rogers will ascend the scaffold bravely, and meet death as a woman should."

In the expected course of events, there will be two clergymen present at the execution, Mr. Hayes and Rev. C. C. Delaney of St. Francis Roman Catholic Church, the former because he is a duty attached to his position, and the second because Mrs. Rogers, at the solicitation of her mother, renewed her devotion to the Catholic church, in which she was baptized, just previous to the first date set for the hanging. Both clergymen visit her every day, the priest whenever she wishes him, Mr. Hayes whenever his trips through the prison bring him to her room.

Tries to Cheer Her.

"My attention to her is more humanitarian than official," says Mr. Hayes, for Father Delaney renders her all spiritual consolation, as she is a member of his church. My visits to her are with the intention of endeavoring to cheer her rather than to administer religious teaching or advice. In this I hope I have succeeded somewhat. Poor woman, how she must die. I am very, very sorry.

On the green lawn before the prison six prisoners were working at their lawn mowers. They are trusties. One of them, whose sentence will expire in a few days, and who consequently has much freedom, talked with me for a few moments. "It is sad news we hear," he said. "It is too bad they are going to hang that woman. I have heard people say they had as leave be hanged as put in State prison for life. Well, I have been here five years, and no man thinks God any more for the life that is coming when he will be free than I do, but it would be better to stay here forever than to walk up that gallows in the corridor. Life is sweet, even at its worst."

"Trusty" Edward Clarke, with Eight Years to Serve, Disappears While at Work as Painter Outside the Walls

Windsor, Vt., June 10.—Edward Clarke, with eight of his ten years sentence still to serve in the State prison here, escaped this afternoon and a posse of armed officers under Superintendent Lovell and Deputy Sheriff J. H. Kinley scoured the woods for miles until dark without avail.

Clarke was a trusty, allowed to work outside the prison under less surveillance than the ordinary prisoners. He is sixty-two years old and until to-day, had been a model prisoner.

He was worked outside and trusted by Superintendent Oakes's administration, and Superintendent Lovell continued the custom. Clarke is a painter. To-day he was at work on a house belonging to the prison across the street from the prison proper, under the supervision of Warden Palmer, who was also watching two other painters on the front of the prison itself. Palmer left Clarke for a few minutes, and returned to find him gone.

A boy saw the man, as soon as the officers back was turned, run down an embankment towards a large pond, not a stone's throw away. An alarm soon followed and an organized search was made until dark without success. The police of surrounding towns were notified.

Clarke was dressed in prison stripes. Prison Physician Richmond says Clarke, because of an incurable illness, had been sentenced for life, and the Superintendent believe the prisoner drowned himself. The pond is to be dragged and a posse will start at sunrise.

AMERICAN WOMEN THRONG POLO CLUB

Special Cable to Sunday American.

Copyright, 1905, by American Journal-Examiner.

Paris, June 10.—The most fashionable event of recent days has been the meeting of the Polo Club, at the Bois de Boulogne. The gathering was particularly noticeable on account of the large number of prominent American society women present, all of whom were arrayed in the height of fashion.

Among the society leaders were Mrs. Bradley Martin, who wore a handsome gown of dark blue, with a Watteau hat of blue, ornamented with a single ostrich plume which measured a yard and a half in length, went entirely around the crown of the hat, and down over the high tilted brim and under the side, ending just behind the right ear.

Mrs. Harjes, Miss Pierpont Morgan, the Countess de Gontaut Biron, nee Leishman, the Countess de Castellane, nee Gould, and many others were among the assembly.

Believes Legislature Now Would Favor Mrs. Rogers

By S. S. Taylor,
REPRESENTATIVE IN VERMONT LEGISLATURE.

If the Legislature were to pass again upon whether Mrs. Rogers were to live or die, and take the vote to-day, I believe it would be strong for life. Sentiment in the Legislature has changed since the vote last Winter.

At that time the legislators had not heard anything about Perham's confession that he testified as he did at the trial to save his own neck, and they did not know anything about the evidence of Dr. McWayne of Hoosick Falls, that Mrs. Rogers was insane two days before the murder. GETS A FINE BURIAL 'I DID IT IN MY SLEEP' BY MISTAKE FOR ANOTHER WOMAN. HE SAYS AFTER HE SHOT FRIEND.

County Home Officials Mixed the Inmates and the Living Mary Johnston Was Mourned as Dead by Her Relatives

Heard Rap on the Window, Took Revolver and Fired at Man Sent by Employer to Relieve Him of Night Duty

Pittsburg, June 10.—The death of Mrs. Mary Johnston, an old inmate of the Allegheny County Home, at Marshalsea, caused untold trouble for the authorities at the home, and also for some supposed relatives of the dead woman.

In the home were two women of the same name and both were of advanced age. One of them died, and the body was sent to the central office of the Department of Charities and Correction. Clerks consulted the records and hurriedly notified the relatives of the other Mary Johnston.

They notified an undertaker to prepare the remains for interment. Then, clad in black raiment, they proceeded to the central office to claim the body. It was not until then that they discovered that the Mary Johnston who had died was not their relative.

Meantime, however, the undertaker had arrived, embalmed the body, placed it in a casket and prepared it for burial, in accordance with instructions from the relatives of the Mary Johnston who was still living. When the relatives discovered that a mistake had been made they promptly withdrew and refused to have anything additional to do with the case. But the undertaker insisted that some one pay the bill.

Had it been an ordinary county case such elaborate preparations would not have been taken for the burial of the woman. The county authorities finally decided that there was nothing to do but pay the bill, and poor Mary Johnston was buried in greater style than if there had not been another Mary Johnston.

Terre Haute, June 10.—Nathaniel Flint, who shot and perhaps fatally wounded his friend, Charles McMullen, at Paris, Ill., offers an explanation that he was sleep-walking.

Flint had been working at the lighting plant, going on duty at midnight. Yesterday he gave notice that he would have to quit because of failing eyesight. He was to be notified if another man had been secured for that night, and if not, he would work one night more.

McMullen was sent to his home at 11:30 to notify him he need not report, and McMullen rapped on the window. Flint arose, took his revolver, and, opening the door, fired without a word of warning.

"I sometimes walk in my sleep," says Flint. "My wife has caught me at it twice. When I have been at the lighting plant I have gone to sleep in my chair, and when I would wake up would find that the oil cups had been filled. There was no explanation other than that I filled them while asleep. I think I was in a condition when I shot poor Charley. God knows I would not shoot him for the world. Why, we were brought up together and always were the best of friends."
